And provided further, That any sum allowed or found to be due to any claimant under this act shall only be paid to such claimant in person if living, and if dead to his administrator or widow and heirs.

Mr. BLAIR. The general law as it now stands is supposed to protect the Treasury and claimants against the raids of agents as fully as they need be protected. I will send to the desk to be read section 3477 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. What does the Senator mean by the payment to a claimant in person? Does he mean that he must go to the Treasury?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. Would it not have that meaning?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. The payment must be made to him. The payments are all made by warrants, and they must be delivered to the claimant, and not to the claim agent. That is the difference.

Mr. HOAR. Sent by mail?

Mr. COCKRELL. Thousands are sent by mail.

Mr. HOAR. I know what they do now.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I want; the warrants to be sent by mail directly to the claimants.

Mr. HOAR. I think the phrase the Senator uses has a known legislative meaning which he can state better than I can because he has more experience in such matters. He says now that the money shall be paid to the claimant in person. That would not, in the ordinary parlance, include the sending of a check or draft by mail in my judgment. If I should testify that I paid the Senator in person and he should prove that I sent it by mail, would not that be a contradiction? To secure what the Senator wants, I think he had better put in two or three words which will make that meaning beyond question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am perfectly willing to put in any words the Senator may suggest to carry out the meaning.

Mr. HOAR. Say "or sent by mail."

Mr. DAWES. "Or by draft payable to his order."

Mr. HOAR. "Or by draft payable to his order."

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not want it payable to his order. I want it payable to him.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure the Senator does not want to have anything inserted that will entangle this matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly not.

Mr. HOAR. If the warrant is payable to him, he will have to go to the Treasury to get the money.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; any bank will pay it. After the warrant is issued it is as assignable as greenbacks or United States bonds.

Mr. HOAR. No, not when it is expressly payable to order.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it is payable to a man he does not have to put in the words "or order;" he can assign it.

Mr. MITCHELL. How can a bank carry it?

Mr. COCKRELL. The same as any other draft payable to order. If it is payable to a man it is payable to his order. There are no such words required in a warrant from the Treasury Department to make it assignable.

Mr. HOAR. Put in the words "in person or by warrant sent to him by mail," and then they will issue it in the ordinary form.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, they will issue it in the ordinary form.

Mr. HOAR. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modification will be reported at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That any sum allowed or found to be due to any claimant under this act shall only be paid to such claimant in person, or by warrant sent to him by mail, if living, and if dead, to his administrator, or widow and heirs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the section of the Revised Statutes sent up by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3477. All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof. Such transfers, assignments, and powers of attorney must recite the warrant for payment, and must be acknowledged by the person making them, before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and shall be certified by the officer; and it must appear by the certificate that the officer, at the time of the acknowledgment, read and fully explained the transfer, assignment, or warrant of attorney to the person acknowledging the same.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the general law which applies to the collection of all claims of this character and all other claims paid from the Treasury, and I do not see any necessity for any amendment to the bill in that regard. The Senator from Massachusetts, who I see is not paying attention to this now, although he did a little while ago, has more constituents interested in this than anybody else, and I would like him to frame the clause in such a way that they can obtain their money without trouble or embarrassment to anybody. I only wish to get it so that it will be satisfactory and right. I do not see any occasion for an amendment to the bill, not the slightest, and I object to the amendment for that reason.

Mr. COCKRELL. The law which the Senator has had read at the desk has been upon the statute-book for many years, and notwithstanding that law is upon the statute-book it is of daily occurrence that the Treasury officials send to claim agents and attorneys here in Washington the warrants that are issued in payment of claims. I now have two constituents whose warrants have been kept in the hands of claim agents here, one for a year, an $800 or $900 warrant, and another for eighteen months. They get hold of them; they can not use them, but they will not deliver them up until they can get 35 or 50 per cent. out of the warrant. An attorney has gone into the courts of this District and tried to get out an injunction to prevent a Secretary of the Treasury from issuing a duplicate upon my application that a duplicate should be issued of a warrant which he had taken, and which, refusing to deliver to the proper owner, should be treated as a nullity. The matter is now pending in the courts. In another case there was a controversy between the home attorney and an attorney here in regard to a fee and the amount of it, and there the warrant has been held in the hands of the attorneys here for nearly eighteen months, according to my recollection. The party entitled to it can not get his warrant.

Now, if this bill becomes a law, just the moment these warrants are ready to be issued parties will come in with their powers of attorney and demand that these warrants shall be delivered to them, and under the law they have a right to have them delivered, as it has been decided from time immemorial. They will put the warrants in their pockets and tell these men, "Give us 25 or 50 per cent. and you can have the warrant." If this bill passes without this restriction it is a law for the benefit of the claim agents purely and solely, and not for the benefit of the laboring people. The claim agents will get the lion's share of the whole thing. I want these words put in so that there shall be no doubt upon the question that these laboring men if they are entitled to anything shall get it themselves, and not have 25, 50, or 75 per cent. deducted by claim agents or attorneys who have done nothing for them in any manner, shape, or form. I insist upon the amendment as an absolute necessity to guard the interests of these claimants.

Mr. BLAIR. If an abuse of the kind which the Senator speaks of exists it is in violation of law, and I certainly am willing to make a special law for this case to prevent any abuse, though I think it can not occur except by violation of the law, which expressly provides that no assignment shall be made. I have no objection to the amendment if the Senator knows of abuses that are arising.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is an assignment made.

Mr. BLAIR. But the Department issue the warrant to nobody but to the party himself.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been universally ruled otherwise.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a violation of law.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been the universal rule. Other Senators here know it. The Senator who is chairman of the Claims Committee will sanction what I have said. There is no doubt of it. Every one who has had occasion to investigate such matters knows that is the way the warrants are issued.

Mr. BLAIR. Then why has not the Committee on Claims, of which the Senator himself has been so long a distinguished member, given us general legislation which would provide against the abuse?

Mr. COCKRELL. There has never been any complaint until within the last few years.

Mr. BLAIR. Why did not the Senator provide against it in the last few years? Now the Senator says there is an abuse. I will not take up time, but put it in the bill so that there shall be no abuse in this case at all events; but if it exists it is in direct violation of law. I hope the Senator will go further with his vigilance and give us a general bill to correct the abuse entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That any sum allowed or found to be due to any claimant under this act shall only be paid to such claimant, in person or by warrant sent to him by mail, if living, and, if dead, to his administrator, or widow and heirs.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to strike out "administrator or widow and heirs" and insert "personal representatives," so that it will read "and, if dead, to his personal representatives." That comprehends every person who has a right to it, whoever it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOAR. That is the universal phrase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. COCKRELL. What would be the technical interpretation of "legal representatives?"

Mr. HOAR. "Personal representatives," not "legal representatives"—a different thing altogether. A personal representative is an executor or administrator, unless by some peculiar system of legislation another party in interest comes in.

Mr. BLAIR. "Legal representatives" would not do.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to "personal representatives" being put in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand this bill, I can not vote for it. This is one of the most unjust propositions that has ever been made. The eight-hour law of 1868 has been for twenty years in operation. Persons who agreed to work ten hours a day for a day's wages and have accepted it and have receipted for their compensation, now come in and ask that a law should be passed giving them wages for the hours they actually worked at the rate per hour which a day's work of eight hours would be.

Now I understand, Mr. President—I speak from information derived in the Committee on Education and Labor—that the demand for this legislation originated among the shipwrights or workers in the shipyards at the Boston navy-yard. They came before the committee; there were some intelligent men who claimed this; and they admitted that at the time they were employed in that yard the commandant told them distinctly or in written notices communicated to them that if they engaged in the employment of the Government they must work ten hours a day.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me right there for saying that the theory upon which this bill goes is that that written notice communicated by the commandant was in direct violation of the law.

Mr. PAYNE. That I do not believe. There was perhaps an abundance of labor there, more than the demand, and there was competition to obtain work. There was no compulsion on any one. There was not a man employed by the Government who was compelled to work for the Government ten hours a day. He did it voluntarily because it was an object for him pecuniarily to do so, and this notice by the commandant was given and pay accepted under it at the end of every thirty days. Each man's name is on the pay-roll. He was paid for his thirty days of work. The cost for the construction of a new vessel or the repair of an old one went into the accounts of the Navy Department, and it is there undisturbed from that day until this. The Supreme Court have passed upon these claims. Very ingeniously did Senators seek to get into the first section of the bill something that would give validity or legality to these claims. The Supreme Court decided this matter in the case of Martin vs. The United States, reported in 4 Otto, page 400; which is thus stated in the report of the committee:

> In this case the claimant was at work under a special contract to work twelve hours per day from the 1st of October to the 1st of June for $2.50 per day, and ten hours per day from the 1st of June to the 1st of October at $2.25 per day. The court held that the act of June 25, 1868, constituting a day's work, was a direction by Congress to the officers and agents of the Government prescribing the length of time which should constitute a day where no special agreement was made on the subject, but as claimant had made a special agreement he must be bound by it.

That is perfectly plain. It is perfectly reasonable and perfectly just, for because of the superabundance and the oversupply of labor it would not command in the market more than that rate for ten hours' labor. The workman freely accepted it, and yielding his labor with that understanding, the Government has paid for it, and I want to know by what right in law or in equity that man should have this additional pay? He has not earned it, and he has expressly and distinctly abandoned his claim to it; having had notice that the extra time should not be paid for as work. I do not think that the bill would apply to men in ship-yards only. The provision is very general. It applies to all persons in the employment of the Government. It applies to policemen.

Mr. PLATT. No, it is limited in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I beg pardon; it says everybody in the employment of the Government.

Mr. BLAIR. "Laborers, workmen, and mechanics."

Mr. PAYNE. It applies to every one in the employment of the Government.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will excuse me, the language of the bill is "whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government."

Mr. PAYNE. Is not the policeman a workman? Is not the fireman a workman? What is he if he is not? He is not a capitalist; he is a laborer.

Mr. BLAIR. If he works more than eight hours, he ought to be paid for it according to law.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he is not aware that this is perfectly in accordance with the precedent of the Government itself?

Mr. PAYNE. The very report of the committee in this case shows just what they claim. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the estimate of the cost of this bill. How many million dollars?

Mr. BLAIR. I will answer that question by asking another—because it is my right, living in the northeast part of the country—whether it be more or less, what consequence is it if the debt be justly due?

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose it is not justly due?

Mr. BLAIR. If it be justly due, the bill should pass if the amount due is the smallest amount that could be mentioned. However, the Senator's question deserves a more direct answer, which I can give either now or later.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have the Senator give an estimate of the cost and expenditure under the bill if it passes.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not do it for the reason that the executive officers say that it would require a very prolonged and troublesome examination of the pay-rolls of the several Departments for quite a number of years of time past, and unless there should be a law by virtue of which it should become necessary to ascertain the balances due it is hardly thought that they will undertake the investigation. But the Secretary of the Navy, as I understand from documents which were before the committee and which are in the report of the House committee if not in that of the Senate committee, has estimated that the amount due employés in the Navy Department, where the great majority of the cases are, would not be over $3,000,000. It might be very much less, and I imagine it must be very much less for the reason that upon an examination of the subject we find that these men did not overwork their time according to the law of eight hours during the winter, six months of the season, so that the extra pay they earned would only apply to one-half of the year, and it nearly all applies to the years between 1876 and 1883, inclusive, making eight years, so that it really covers only about four years' time.

I have heard various estimates by workingmen's committees and others who have examined the subject as well as they could, and the sum is put all the way from a million dollars or a million and a half to four million dollars. I never heard a higher estimate than $4,000,000 from any one who claimed to know about or to be interested in the subject. But the question after all is whether the Government ought to pay it. The Government has paid for eight hours' work, and many of these men performed labor to the amount of ten hours daily for a part of the year. If the Government were able to pay for eight hours' work, they ought to pay for two hours' work in addition.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the Senator answering my question?

Mr. BLAIR. I think I am. I was trying to show the Senator that his question is irrelevant. It is a question of conscience really, in the first place, whether we owe anything or not; and if we owe anything, we do not owe over $4,000,000, according to the largest estimate.

I will answer the Senator's question further, for the Senator will observe that I have not had the floor yet to present the points of the issue. Senators have commenced discussing it just as the subject occurred to their minds from time to time. I presume we should get along quite as fast if I had taken the floor and had had an opportunity to explain the subject in the usual way.

Mr. PAYNE. Go on.

Mr. BLAIR. I have here a list of men whose names appear upon the Government register during the period which the workmen and the Departments understand to be covered by the bill. This information, as I am told by the committee of workmen, was obtained on their solicitation by an order sent through the War, Navy, and State Departments, and they thought the Interior Department also, though that would not be so very material, there not being a great many under that Department touched by the bill in any case. They received this reply:

> Statement showing the number and residences of mechanics, workmen, and laborers in the several States and Congressional districts entitled to back pay under the eight-hour law and under the provisions of Senate bill No. 405 and House bill 1539 of Fiftieth Congress, as appears by the official register of the United States.

I may say there have been six committee reports, three in the House and three in the Senate, if I am not mistaken in my recollection of them, after careful examination, favoring this bill in different Congresses.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not understand the moral obligation of the Government to pay this extra price contrary to the distinct and intelligent understanding. There was no fraud, there was no deception. The law did not imperatively require that this additional compensation should be paid. It does provide what shall be considered a legal day's work, but it does not disable the employés from making a contract. If the supply was greater than the demand they could work for half the ordinary price if they chose.

As I said before, there was no compulsion. They were notified distinctly by the superintendent of the yard that if they would work so many hours in the day they would receive $2, or $3, or $4. With that perfect understanding they fulfilled it; they discharged their obligation, and the Government discharged its obligation by paying the money, and the men received the pay.

A gentleman from Boston, and being from Boston I suppose he is a very sharp man, with others helping him, have been lobbying in Congress for some ten or fifteen years to get through a bill to enable them to override the courts. The courts have decided against them. When I suggested in committee that they ought to go before the Court of Claims they replied, "The Court of Claims has decided against us; we want a law that will compel the Court of Claims to decide in our favor."

The estimate of the chairman ot the committee is not definite. The amount involved may be $5,000,000 or $10,000,000, but I claim that the Government is not indebted to these men. Every man having a claim may bring suit before the Court of Claims. There would be ten or twelve thousand suits brought before the Court of Claims to have these accounts adjusted. I can see no reason or justice or equity in it. I believe the bill ought to except all cases where there was a distinct agreement to the contrary, and nobody would be wronged by such a provision.

Mr. DAWES. I am very heartily in sympathy with the purpose of this bill, but I am earnestly, sincerely afraid that its purpose would not be carried out by the bill itself.

The bill provides that all these men shall receive pay for their labor at the rate of so much for 8 hours, and then requires every one of them to commence a suit in the Court of Claims in order to obtain that excess. He must get a judgment of the Court of Claims upon a claim he has against the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. That establishes the claim.

Mr. DAWES. That establishes the claim. It provides in the outset that there shall be 14,767 such suits, because there are so many men, according to the enumeration presented here, who have these claims. There must be a claim that can be adjudicated upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. Perhaps he would like to have me correct him. The bill provides—

That all suits under this act shall be commenced within two years from and after its passage; and any number of said claimants may join in the same suit.

It is like a bill in equity; so that they join and end it forthwith.

Mr. DAWES. That is a suit with 14,000 heads to it, and there have got to be just as many issues as there are individuals. I do not see how that will essentially relieve these parties. Every one of them has got to have his issue tried separately. They can not combine in the issue, though they may, as appears, combine in the suit itself.

*Per month. †Per hour.

The Supreme Court has decided that when they agreed to work ten hours for eight hours' pay that agreement is binding on them. Suppose they go into the Court of Claims and say they have worked ten hours, and there turns up an agreement on their part that they would work ten hours for eight hours' pay, I have an apprehension that the Court of Claims would decide that they have no basis for their claim.

Mr. PAYNE. I beg to interrupt the Senator. That would have to be the decision of the Court of Claims, but for the first section of the bill making an absolute obligation, whether there was any agreement or not.

Mr. DAWES. I was going to say, if I had not been interrupted, that is the only ground upon which any one of them can maintain his suit in the Court of Claims. The proposed statute first creates the obligation and sends them into the Court of Claims upon a new obligation, created a long time after they have performed their work. That seems to me to be unnecessary.

I have here a copy of an agreement which at the armory at Springfield was held up as an alternative to no work, and every man who worked at the armory after the passage of the law and after the proclamation of President Grant that they should be paid by the hour had this alternative: "If you want to work in the Springfield Armory you must sign this agreement."

We, the undersigned, employed at the National Armory, Springfield, Mass., on behalf of the United States, hereby agree to work ten hours each calendar day, or at the rate thereof, for the sums set opposite our respective names. This contract is made in conformity to General Orders No. 53, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, June 1, 1887, and can be terminated at the pleasure of the United States or the subscribing party.

It seems to me that the only way a man could maintain his claim in the Court of Claims would be upon the idea that you create in the act itself which sends him to the Court of Claims the basis of the judgment. That is to say, he had no claim that would abide a moment in the Court of Claims unless you create it in this proposed statute.

This is not a new matter. When General Grant insisted upon it that the eight-hour law should be carried out in the spirit and in the letter, after the attempt had been made to make the employés of the Government work ten hours for eight hours' pay he issued a proclamation requiring that in all the Government works they should be paid at the rate of eight hours. Thereupon Congress passed a law to pay up to the date of that proclamation every one of them at the rate of eight hours. They did not send them to the Court of Claims, but they passed a law in these words:

That the proper accounting officers be, and are hereby, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of workmen, laborers, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of the reduction of the hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Under that act all the employés described in the phraseology of the pending bill had their opportunity to go and show at the Treasury, to the accounting officers of the Treasury, that they had not been paid according to the hour.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment at that point?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The point the Senator is driving at, I suppose, is that it might be better to send these men to the accounting officers for the differences, if any shall be found to be due, which should be paid to them. That is just what the men all over the country are exceedingly anxious not to be obliged to do. All their trouble has come from the obstinacy and stubbornness and the determination of the officers of the Executive Departments not to administer according to its terms and spirit the eight-hour law.

I wish to give the Senator a fact in regard to that. Under that law, which passed on an appropriation bill, requiring that the excesses due for the labor performed beyond the eight hours between the 25th day of June, 1868, and the date of President Grant's proclamation, which was in May, 1869, a little less than a year, it was computed that there were some $300,000 due. These men have importuned and begged and tried their best, and they have collected less than $25,000 from the accounting officers of the Treasury. Therefore they want to be sent to the Court of Claims so that if they have any rights they will have the judgment of the Court of Claims, which Congress will attend to, and not the accounting officers of the Government.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator generally states a subject very well; but when I saw this bill which requires all these persons, some for $20, some for $30, and some for $40, small sums, to get a judgment of the Court of Claims before they could be paid, my mind went back to the law. I offered a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report what had been done under the law, and the report is in print here. Every man's claim presented was described in the act as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, who claimed to have worked over eight hours, except those about which there was a dispute as to whether they had worked over eight hours or not. Every one was paid, and the aggregate was nearly $700,000.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I do not know what document he has before him. I wish to read from the House committee report of the present session.

Mr. DAWES. That House report was made before the report came from the Treasury in answer to my resolution. I introduced it because I thought this bill would impose a grievous burden upon small claimants, and I thought that the phraseology taken from the statute was sufficient for the day. I introduced a bill in the words of the statute, providing for the adjustment of the accounts of laborers and mechanics, arising under the eight-hour law, on the 6th of February last, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States since the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, whether engaged at a price per day or upon piece work or task work, without any reduction of pay on account of the reduction of the hours of labor, any agreement between the United States and any such laborer, workman, or mechanic touching such compensation to the contrary notwithstanding. And the proper accounting officers are hereby directed to readjust the accounts of all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and pay the same in conformity with the provisions of this act; and a sufficient sum of money for that purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator what was the date of the report from the Secretary of the Treasury to which he refers?

Mr. DAWES. It is dated since this bill came from the House. I can not tell the date.

Mr. BUTLER. At this session?

Mr. DAWES. At this session. As the Senator says, the laborers took alarm at it and came here and importuned me to drop that bill and let them go to the Court of Claims, but this significant thing accompanied it all. Every one who came here came with a claim agent.

I am not desirous of obstructing this measure. I desire that when these men ask for bread they shall not have a stone given them. The form of statute which I have read did work the compensation of every one up to that date about whose claim there was no dispute. I think the accounting officers of the Treasury, if required in this distinct language, could decide whether these men worked ten or eight hours, just as well as the Court of Claims.

But, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, these men think that they can not get their rights except through the Court of Claims. I am afraid that has been put into their heads by claim agents; but I am not going to offer my bill as a substitute for the pending measure. I wanted to put on record my opinion that this is a stone instead of a loaf of bread, and that not 50 per cent. of the little items due these laborers from the Government for work over eight hours will ever reach their pockets. I desire that they shall have in the spirit and the letter of the eight-hour law compensation for the day of eight hours. They have had it under one form. They are not satisfied with that and want to have a new form; but I wish merely to put upon record my apprehension that these laborers are being misled as to their best remedy.

Mr. VEST. It is not a pleasant thing to run against this juggernaut in this country. Every public man understands the appeals that are now being made to the labor vote of the country, but I should have a very poor opinion of myself if I should vote for this bill.

Whilst the Congress of the United States unquestionably has the constitutional power to pass such a bill, yet it is certainly against the spirit of that instrument. An inhibition was put in the Constitution against any State passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts. There is no such inhibition upon the Congress of the United States in express terms; but when I vote to legislate here, though I give way frequently to personal solicitation and to temptations that present themselves in an alluring form in behalf of æsthetic and sentimental objects, I still endeavor to discharge my duty to the Government and people of the United States as I would do it to a fellow-man.

Suppose that this were a question between individuals; suppose that any laboring man, a horny-handed son of toil, as we hear so frequently from the hustings, had made a contract with an employer that he would work ten hours a day and receive a dollar and a half for ten hours' labor. What would be thought of him if he would afterwards present himself in a court of equity and ask that that contract be deliberately set aside and that he should receive pay for work he never performed?

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The United States is the employer. The United States has a law upon its statute-book that every laborer, workman, and mechanic shall be paid for a full day's work when he works eight hours. A subordinate officer, an agent of the United States, if you choose, an agent to act under the law and only according to the law, says to the "horny-handed sons of toil," who have families, and who are hungry and who must have work, and because they have had it they are horny-handed, "Unless you work ten hours you shall not work for the United States at all, notwithstanding we are authorized only to hire at the rate of eight hours for a day's work." Does the Senator hold that that unauthorized act by the agent is to be ratified by the United States?

Mr. VEST. I hold that every intelligent citizen of this country should be bound by his contract.

Mr. BLAIR. But that is no contract.

Mr. VEST. It is the contract. The Supreme Court has so decided.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon; there is no such decision.

Mr. VEST. This identical question was presented to the Supreme Court and they decided that where there was an express contract these parties could not recover.

Mr. BLAIR. But that is the question. I say there is no express contract.

Mr. VEST. That is a question of law; and here we have the extraordinary anomaly of the Congress of the United States pretending to put before one of its tribunals a question of law and at the same time telling them they will adjudicate the matter in advance. The whole object of this bill is to say that the Court of Claims shall decide in advance of any facts that may be given to them that eight hours a day shall constitute a day's work for these people, whether a contract had been made or not.

Mr. GEORGE. Every legal question involved is settled by the bill.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course; it is res adjudicata. Such a thing was never known among educated lawyers as an attempt to force upon the statute-books, in advance of the facts and in advance of any legal adjudication, the result of the whole thing.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to state how he makes that out? There is no express contract; there is no implied contract whatever between these laborers and the United States until the United States ratifies the illegal act of its agent.

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon; the few remarks I wish to make I will continue, by the Senator's permission, without interruption. He asks me how I make it out. Here is the proposed statute upon which it is declared:

That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States since the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, without any reduction of pay on account of the reduction of the hours of labor.

Whether there is an express contract or not it is mandatory. Then the second section goes on and provides that the Court of Claims, no matter what the facts are, shall find that eight hours a day constitute a day's labor, and shuts out any express contract. The amendment reported to the bill proposes to strike out the clause—

Or payment made or receipt given for a less sum per day than the full price of a day's work, as provided in the first section of this act.

And the chairman of the committee tells us he is opposed to striking out those words.

Unquestionably it was intended there to put this matter beyond the slightest scintilla of doubt, for it says that the Court of Claims shall go on and make these decisions—and no statute of limitation or payment made or receipt given for a less sum per day than the full price of a day's work, as provided in the first section of this act, shall bar the right of recovery.

Mr. President, here is a part of this legislation in which it is proposed that the Government of the United States shall take charge of the citizen and make a contract for him and relieve him from his own deliberate act. Although the contract has been made, although years have elapsed, although it was done distinctly and emphatically for a purpose at the time, now the Government comes in and takes the place of the intellectual assent of its citizen and says, "We will do better for you than you did for yourself; we will pay you this money in spite of your own deliberate contract." I can not vote for any such bill. It is abhorrent to my ideas of justice. I would not pretend to do such a thing to a fellow-citizen. I would not pretend to undertake to force this sort of pre-adjudication upon any man in the United States who, like myself, is a simple citizen, and I will not do it on the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. There should be a distinct understanding as to the agreement between the Government agent and the employés. There were several witnesses examined before the committee, and I am very sorry that the report of the committee omits one very important fact. There was not a single case before the committee where it was claimed that the man had not been employed under a distinct agreement or understanding. It was stated that in the Boston navy-yard a leading man had been getting up these things for years and agitating them here in Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. To whom does the Senator refer? I do not recollect any such man from Boston. There was a Mr. Rogers who was one of these workmen, but he was a "horny-handed son of toil" himself.

Mr. PAYNE. I say without a single exception if there was not a written agreement signed by the party at the Springfield arsenal there was this understanding, and he admitted it, that they went to work upon the distinct declaration that they were to work ten hours a day for their wages. They went into that agreement, and why should they not abide by it? It was said that there was a secret purpose, that some day they would get the difference out of the Goverement.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will remember that the witnesses all stated that the services were rendered under protest, as being contrary to law. The men were obliged to work on the terms that the person in charge insisted upon, or not get the work that they expected. The Senator may not remember all the testimony.

Mr. PAYNE. I remember that part of it, because I cross-examined the witness myself, and he stated distinctly that there was no formal protest. They did not say "we will receive this under protest," but it was a mental protest, a private belief thaf some day or other they would get the extra pay.

Mr. DAWES. I will read what the Supreme Court have decided. I believe that there was an agreement either express or implied, and that agreement I think under this decision of the Supreme Court will be fatal to these men if their pay depends upon a judgment in the Court of Claims. But if it depends upon the direct order of a statute to the Treasury accounting officers to pay it as in the bill I presented and as in the statute of 1871, it will be paid.

The Supreme Court have decided what I think will turn out to be fatal to every case that goes into the Court of Claims if there turns up any agreement either express or implied. I read the syllabus of the case of the United States vs. Martin, 4 Otto, page 400.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator read the opinion?

Mr. DAWES. I will read the syllabus, and then I will read the opinion if it is desired.

1. The act of Congress of June 25, 1868 (15 Stat., 77), declaring that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, is in the nature of a direction by the Government to its agents.

2. It is not a contract between the Government and its laborers that eight hours shall constitute a day's work. It neither prevents the Government from making agreements with them by which their labor may be more or less than eight hours a day nor does it prescribe the amount of compensation for that or any other number of hours' labor.

3. Where, therefore, a laborer, in the habit of working for the Government twelve hours a day for $2.50 a day, is informed by the proper authority that if he remains in the service at that compensation he must continue to work twelve hours a day, and he does so continue—and is paid accordingly, he can not afterwards recover for the additional time over eight hours as a day's labor.

4. An allowance by the Government, upon the application of the laborer, of a sum for the excess of time over eight hours per day, is, when accepted by him in full of the account, a bar to any further claim."

Shall I read the opinion?

Mr. GEORGE. That is very good.

Mr. DAWES. The opinion goes on to say that it is not incompatible with the contract; that any contract as to different hours is a legal contract, and if a man continues after notice he is presumed to have conformed to that notice. I think that is as fatal to him as can be when he gets into the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the attempt in this bill to create a new basis for the judgment. Therefore it is that I want these men to have something, and I want the accounting officers of the Treasury directed to pay them at the rate of eight hours a day for all the hours they worked, and to appropriate a sum sufficient for that purpose out of any money in the Treasury. Then they will have something; otherwise I fear that they will not.

Mr. VEST. The object of this bill is to reverse that decision of the Supreme Court. After they had received that construction of the law of 1868 and of the express or implied contract made between the Government and the employés, this bill was constructed for the purpose of deciding in advance for the Court of Claims what should be done in reference to this contract, or notwithstanding the contract, express or implied, and that is the whole of it.

Now, a single word about this claim of duress, and I am done. I am astounded to hear that claim presented here to-day. If it were in the crowded labor marts of Europe, if we were legislating here to-day for the pallid sons of toil and want, the pauper labor of Europe, I could understand that sort of duress; but we have heard so much from our friends on the opposite side of this Chamber of the American workman, his high wages, plenty of work, a continent opening up its virgin soil and all its resources to his energies and intellect, and yet we are told when a man has deliberately agreed to work for the Government of the United States at so many dollars a day, working ten or twelve hours, he did it under duress, for his starving wife and children!

What becomes of our panacea, the tariff? Is it possible that the workingmen of this country are in that condition? Is it possible that they were compelled under duress to make a contract of this sort? I deny it; I repudiate it. No American workman has done any such thing. There is no man in this country who is willing to work who can not find a field of work and select his own avocation.

For one, sir, I honestly believe, without disrespect to anybody, that this is simply a political appeal to a certain class of voters in the country, intended to say to them, "We are your special friends, and we will put money into your pockets, notwithstanding your own contracts made in the past." I can not vote for it.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill as an additional section; whether it is in order or not, I will read it for the information of the Senate. I think it will have a tendency to prevent evils of this kind in the future. I propose to add:

Any officer or agent of the United States who shall hereafter authorize any laborer under his charge or control to perform for the United States more than eight hours of manual labor in one day shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500.

I was one of those who voted for the original eight-hour law of 1868, and I offer this amendment, if it is in order now. I voted for the original bill, and the object was to fix eight hours as a day's labor. It was then anticipated that it would be followed by the States and by the people generally. I was one of those who believed that eight hours was as much labor as a man ought to perform for the good of himself and his family and the good of the country. I believed that in the course of a lifetime he could perform more labor by confining it to eight hours a day than if it was dragged out through a longer period. He would be worn out more rapidly than he would be if his labor were confined to eight hours. I thought the Government ought to set the example, and I think so now.

Besides, there is none too much labor in the country. There are a great many people out of employment, and there always will be. There are laborers enough in the country to perform all the labor by only working eight hours per day. I believed that it was for the general interest of the country, and I regret exceedingly that the officers of the Government have undertaken to thwart this legislation and are continuing to do so, requiring legislation to compel them to do their duty. It seems that it is necessary to have a criminal statute to prevent them from violating the plain intent and meaning of the law, and it is time it was stopped.

I say that I should like to see the present law put in such a shape that those who are compelled to labor more than eight hours should be paid for the extra time, and that the theory of the law should be carried out. I think it is time that the officers and agents of this Government had some respect for the laws of Congress. The idea of making contracts in plain violation of the spirit of the law, such contracts as have been read here to-day, is a disgrace to those officers, and there ought to be a criminal act on the statute-book to prevent it in future. Then it would stop. I am in favor of putting the law in such a shape that these laborers will get their money, and I am in favor of such a law as will stop such practices on the part of Government officers hereafter. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States ought to have sufficient power to pass laws by which its own officers will be guided, so that they shall not undertake to set up a policy for themselves.

This country will not be injured by an eight-hour law. Everybody will be better for it. There is abundance of labor. The Senator from Missouri talks about the friends of the laborer. I am a friend of the laborer; I am not ashamed to own it, and I do it in no sense of demagogy in trying to get their votes. I was a laborer myself and I know something about it. I say that I am a friend of the laborer, and I believe that labor can be advanced, that laborers can be made healthier by not working them to death, continuing them at work long hours, destroying them in a few years, and preventing them from having the privileges of education, recreation, and the necessary rest.

There are laborers enough in this country to do all the work that is to be done. We see tramps around asking for labor; they can not get it. The idea of holding them to contracts coerced from them in that disgraceful way by these officers should not be tolerated.

I am sorry that my noble friend from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] should have talked about enforcing a contract made under duress, made to the disgrace of the officers who made it. Do you talk about enforcing it, about standing on a technical contract of that kind, and about decisions of the Supreme Court holding them bound by it because there was no law on the statute-book to prevent such a contract, when the plain language employed is that no such thing shall be done, when the policy of the Government was plain, when every officer who made those contracts knew it; and then because we have a technical decision in that way do you say that we should not remedy the evil and defend the honor of Congress?

Mr. PAYNE. You said you were a laborer?

Mr. STEWART. I was.

Mr. PAYNE. From your experience do you say that it is necessary to have a law to control the hours of labor?

Mr. STEWART. I would not need a criminal law to prevent me from controlling labor. I have asked for a criminal law to prevent officers of the Government from making contracts contrary to law. When I was a laboring man, if I wanted to do more than eight hours work I could find half a dozen jobs outside. But I do not want any Government officer to violate the law by making a sham contract with me. I do not require that. I could take care of myself under the eight-hour law very well when I was a laboring man, and I can do it yet. I have been very well satisfied with eight hours' labor a day.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. If it is agreeable to the Senator, as there is no quorum here, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. Undoubtedly the Senator is willing to move an adjournment when another man is talking, but I never knew him to move an adjournment when he was talking himself. [Laughter.] When I am through I will make that motion myself, but I have the floor and I shall not yield it until I get ready.

Mr. SPOONER. May I make a suggestion to my friend from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It sometimes happens in the service of the Government, as in the service of individuals, that there come emergencies in which it is necessary that men should work, if they are willing to work, over eight hours a day. Do you intend to prohibit that? Would it not be better to frame an amendment so as to prohibit such contracts and yet permit work in case of emergency, where the interest of the Government requires it?

Mr. STEWART. There would be too many emergencies, I am afraid.

Mr. SPOONER. We have had such cases during this session.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to suggest that the bill does not prohibit extra hours of labor for extra pay. It is only a prohibition of more than eight hours at the ordinary daily pay.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Perhaps we can modify the amendment to meet that case. I see that cases of emergency might occur. It might be modified, but it is evident there must be some criminal law to prevent the constant violation of the eight-hour law. The opposition to it comes from some sources I can hardly appreciate, but it appears that it is impossible to get a law that will be respected without some criminal statute. However, we can amend the bill so that it will have that criminal sanction.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator if he has any information that the law is now being violated or has been violated under the present Administration?

Mr. STEWART. I have not looked up the record of the present Administration.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BLAIR. The President has given his opinion that the construction of the law claimed by the friends of this bill is the true construction of the original law, that a man ought to be paid the full daily wages of outside work regardless of the length of the day for his eight hours' work in behalf of the Government.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand that all the animadversion of the Senator from Nevada applies to acts done under administrations preceding the present one.

Mr. STEWART. It applies to anybody who has made a contract of that kind. There may be emergencies when men might be required to work longer than eight hours. Perhaps we shall have to amend the measure in that respect.

Mr. BLAIR. Give them extra pay.

Mr. STEWART. I do not believe in giving them extra pay or allowing them to work extra hours, because there is not a surplus of work. I believe that all should have a chance, and I believe when eight hours' work has been given that is all the Government ought to give to any man in any one day. Give the rest of them a chance. I do not believe in putting it out in extra pay. When there was an emergency there might be cases requiring extra hours of labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator before moving to adjourn allow me to read the facts, about six lines, on which the decision that has been cited was made? If the Senator will listen to this he will see that this decision does not touch the case; it is only binding so far as the facts are concerned. It is as follows:

In the year 1873 the claimant made a formal application, in writing, to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, for arrears of pay, claimed as due him under the second section of the act of May 18, 1812, 17 Statutes, 134, between the 25th of June, 1868, and the 19th of May, 1869, on account of his said employment. The Auditor thereupon stated the account, and allowed the claimant $205.63, which was admitted by the Second Comptroller; and that amount was paid to the claimant, who receipted for the same, in writing, in full of the account. (United States vs. Martin, 94 United States Reports (4 Otto), 402.)

The Senator will observe that after the services were rendered, and after the claim was made and after a tribunal was provided and an adjudication was made, the defeated party to that adjudication accepts the award, receipts for it in full of his claim, and the Supreme Court held that that adjudication and the acceptance of the award were binding upon him.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that we are violating our own doctrines this very moment, manifesting great interest for the poor laborers of this country and asking that they be required only to work eight hours; and yet we are imposing upon these poor laborers here, our reporters, about twelve hours of work.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BUTLER. I was just about to move, in their behalf, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 13, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 12, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MARY M. BRIGGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill S. 899, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate, for the relief of Mary M. Briggs.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will insist on its amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CUTCHEON to print in the RECORD remarks on the subject of pensions, pertaining to the special order of this evening.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SIMMONS, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PERRY, for one week from this date.

To Mr. HOLMES, for two days, on account of important business.

EVENING SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF LABOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that next Wednesday night be set apart for the consideration of business from the Labor Committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing to consent if the next night is set apart for the consideration of business from the Military Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope an intimation will be given of the bills to be brought forward.

Mr. MILLS. Let us deal with one matter at a time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well; let that first be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the House on Wednesday next take a recess from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Labor?

There was no objection.

EVENING SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF MILITARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the same request for the Military Committee; that Thursday night of next week be set apart for the consideration of business from that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will give some intimation of the character of the bills that will be brought before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Something like twelve hundred bills have been introduced and referred to that committee, and over one hundred have been reported to the House. It is not in my power to designate the bills. The gentleman knows full well that bills can not receive final consideration at the night sessions unless it is done practically by unanimous consent. Therefore I do not think he ought to insist upon having a list of the bills. I can not state at present just what bills I shall bring forward.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will you bring forward the fortification bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not at a night session, because it would be useless to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent that next Tuesday evening be set apart for the consideration of general pension bills.

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better have the regular order. Four nights have already been assigned for business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports.

Mr. GEAR. I wish to present a couple of reports.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen having reports to make be allowed to present them to the Clerk for appropriate reference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

HOLDING OF DISTRICT COURT, UNITED STATES.

Mr. CASWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1437) to provide for the holding of the district court of the United States at Salina, Kans.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LANDS FOR MINING PURPOSES.

Mr. HARE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6162) to authorize the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations of Indiana, respectively, to lease lands within their respective boundaries for mining purposes, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and to validate leases heretofore made for said purposes by the proper authorities of any of said nations; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES AND WILLIAM CROOKS.

Mr. COTHRAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3879) for the relief of James and William Crooks, of Canada; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CEDAR RAPIDS AND IOWA FALLS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1076) granting right of way to the Cedar Rapids, Iowa Falls and Northwestern Railway Company over and across the Pipestone reservation, in the State of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT M'NUTT.

Mr. GEAR also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 157) correcting the military history of Robert McNutt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JUNCTION CITY AND FORT RILEY STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1969) granting right of way to the Junction City and Fort Riley Street Railway Company into and upon the Fort Riley military reservation, in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OMAHA, HAYS CITY AND SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LAIRD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 973) to authorize the Omaha, Hays City and Southwestern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays military reservation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHICAGO, KANSAS AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LAIRD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1473) to authorize the Chicago, Kansas and Western Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays military reservation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH UNCOMPAHGRE, ETC., RESERVATIONS.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6707) to grant the Rio Grande and Pacific Railway Company the right of way through the Uncompahgre and Uintah reservations, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ACCEPTANCE OF FOUNTAIN, ETC., FROM CITY OF FRANKFORT, KY.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10054) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to accept fountain and lamp from the city of Frankfort, Ky.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 193) directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to amend the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 191) relating to the pages of the House of Representatives;

An act (H. R. 860) for the relief of Alfred Head;

An act (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hattie K. Painter;

An act (H. R. 1361) to incorporate the reform school for girls of the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 1451) for the completion of a public building at Wichita, Kans.;

An act (H. R. 956) for relief of heirs of Christopher Cott;

An act (H. R. 3290) to amend section 685 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 1514) relating to the record of wills in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 99) providing for the printing of a portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce and navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual report of Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amount of duty and rate of duty collected."

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2807) to grant to the Puyallup Valley Railway Company a right of way through the Puyallup Indian reservation in Washington Territory, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris, and Dardanelles Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory to or near Baxter Springs in the State of Kansas.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Which morning hour?

The SPEAKER. There is but one morning hour. The words "morning hour" have a well-understood meaning in the rules of the House and have had for many years. They mean the hour set apart for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And not the hour for the consideration of bills?

The SPEAKER. No.

The motion of Mr. MILLS to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be allowed an annual clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until March 3, 1889, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, and the Committee on Appropriations are hereby instructed to make provision for such clerk at the said rate of $2,000 per annum from said March 3, 1889.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman yields to me for a moment to give me an opportunity to say to the House that the business for this evening session is such that a quorum will be required, and if a quorum is not present a call of the House is certain to ensue.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw the demand for the present.

Mr. FORD. I desire to present a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is charged by prominent journals that the laws prohibiting the importation of contract laborers, convicts, paupers, and other classes are being extensively evaded, owing to the lack of machinery to enforce the provisions of said laws: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker shall appoint a select committee of five, which committee is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the subject-matter herein refered to, and report their conclusions thereon to the House at the earliest practicable moment, by bill or otherwise. Such investigation shall be conducted at such times and places as the said committee may deem proper, and may continue after the adjournment of the present session of Congress, if necessary, and said committee is hereby authorized to send for and examine persons, books, and papers, and administer oaths to witnesses, and to employ a messenger, a stenographer, and necessary interpreters; and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my friend from Michigan that it might be sufficient to limit the amount of expenditure.

Mr. FORD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the amount should not exceed $3,000.

Mr. FORD. They allowed the committee to investigate trusts $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the resolution so as to provide that the expenses shall not exceed $3,000.

Mr. WILKINS. That is not enough. I suggest $5,000.

Mr. FORD. It ought to be $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. A committee of the House, with five members, a sergeant-at-arms, and clerks, conducted an investigation which lasted three months and a half, at an expense not exceeding $3,000.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution the words "and the expenses of said investigation shall not exceed $3,000."

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] what is the purpose of creating a subcommittee to make this investigation. Why can not the Committee on Labor do it?

Mr. FORD. I do not know that there is any particular object, except that I thought it would be better to have a special committee than to refer the subject to any of the standing committees of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. KERR. I suggest that the resolution be amended so as to require the committee to report during this session. It seems to me that the time we shall probably have during this session will be sufficient to enable this committee to make their investigation and report, so that we may have legislation on this subject at once, this year, and not wait until the next session. I therefore propose that the resolution be amended so as to require the report to be made to the present session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. There is one amendment pending now, and until that is disposed of no other is in order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demands the previous question upon his amendment.

Mr. OATES. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand for a minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the demand if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. OATES. I will. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as an exceedingly important matter. The resolution, as I understand, proposes to raise a special committee for this work, and I think that is right. It ought to be a special committee composed of the best men in this House, because, in my judgment, there is no more important question that the Congress can be called upon to consider than that which this resolution aims at. I have during all this session and previously been seeking and obtaining very important information touching this question and the abuses referred to in that resolution. There is no doubt at all in my mind that there have been many such abuses, many evasions of the existing law. Classes of immigrants are being brought to this country practically in slavery, in violation of every principle of our statutes, and greatly to the injury of the public. These abuses ought to be remedied by suitable legislation, and for that purpose we ought to obtain all the information practicable. A special committee of suitable men ought to be raised. They ought not to be cramped by too strict a limitation upon the amount to be expended, and they ought to have a fair amount of time in which to investigate this matter to the bottom, so as to make a report on which every gentleman may rely and on which the House can act intelligently.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest to my colleague on the committee to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. FORD. I have already agreed to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not accept the amendment, though he may oppose it. The amendment must be voted upon by the House.

Mr. VANDEVER. I wish to inquire whether this resolution by its terms extends to evasions of the law in reference to Chinese immigration. If it does not, it should be amended so as to embrace that subject.

Mr. FORD. It does include that subject. The language is "and other classes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. FORD. I understand the previous question to be upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it to be upon the amendment and the resolution.

Mr. COX. It was not intended in that way.

Mr. FORD. I think it was intended to apply only to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. In that case the previous question will be considered as operating only on the amendment.

Mr. FORD. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I called for the previous question generally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood; and so put the question to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will renew the call for the previous question, I will withdraw it.

Mr. COX. On the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman did not have the floor to move the previous question on the resolution itself; he only had the floor to move the previous question on the amendment. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] was in possession of the floor, and simply yielded to allow the gentleman from Indiana to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan did not yield to the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Michigan did not surrender the floor; he simply allowed the gentleman from Indiana to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan could not prevent the gentleman from Indiana from offering the amendment, unless he retained the floor, and he did not retain it. The gentleman from Indiana obtained the floor and offered his amendment. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the great necessity of this resolution for the collection of information, and to express the hope that it may lead to the securing of further legislation in relation to our immigration system. At Castle Garden and elsewhere——

Mr. MORROW. At San Francisco.

Mr. COX. At San Francisco and wherever else there have been abuses under the existing laws, wherever there has been a failure to enforce the law, there is need of inquiry into these abuses with a view to their correction. When I went to New York City, the week before last, I was surprised to find the condition of things with reference to Italian immigration into that city. I was called upon by a gentleman who had collected facts in relation to this matter, facts certified by the Italian consul and others in New York, showing evils and abuses which the best Italian people, as well as the officials of our Government charged with these matters, desire to have corrected. Those facts disclose an abnormal immigration to this country by a class of men who are persuaded to come here by false and fraudulent pretenses; so that, instead of the ordinary healthful immigration which might be readily and advantageously assimilated, we have eighty thousand persons a year coming here under these improper influences.

Mr. FORD. Fifty thousand in one month in the city of New York.

Mr. COX. Fifty thousand in the city of New York, and in one month; men who are ignorant of our customs, who do not understand our language, who know nothing of our institutions, and who come here, many of them, mere tramps or adventurers, who frequently come to prey upon our own people.

I desire this inquiry for another reason. Men who are engaged in this business, Italians, bankers, and it is said also that the steam-ship companies have their agents in towns in southern Italy in the Calabrian country, and they induce these ignorant men, poor men, men who desire to better their condition, to leave their native country and come to the United States, to the great disadvantage of the people themselves, and to the great detriment of American labor.

I desire not only to have this investigation complete, but also to have proper legislation, which will be the outcome of it. We have the data for this resolution, facts which have been collected by the New York Herald and by other newspapers, showing the necessity for it; and as in the old English Parliament, laws were passed under the stress of public clamor, so in this case we have enough of public clamor to justify the adoption of this resolution; and I trust, sir, that it will result in strong, stringent, perhaps drastic legislation would be a better word, so as to remedy these evils of which so many and such just complaints have been made. I hope an adequate amount will be given for the investigation. I do not think the sum here proposed is sufficient.

Mr. WEAVER. It ought to be $5,000.

Mr. COX. I would not, therefore, limit it as to expenses merely. It involves other important elements connected with our prosperity, and I would, therefore, vote down $3,000, and give what the committee ask.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FORD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORROW. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That will never do. Gentlemen on this side want to be heard.

Mr. MORROW. Give me a few minutes, anyhow.

Mr. FORD. I will withdraw the demand for the present, and yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW].

Mr. DINGLEY addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has yielded to the gentleman from California three minutes.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly glad that this House is at last confronted with the importance of this vital question concerning the character of our present enormous foreign immigration. It is a question that has long and grievously agitated the people of the Pacific coast, and we are familiar with all its worst phases. If it has now become a national question, affecting the more populous East as well as the extreme West, we may reasonably hope for effective measures of relief in the protection of the whole country against this foreign invasion.

On the Pacific coast we have confronted this condition of affairs relating to foreign labor for more than thirty years, during which time our laborers have been compelled to come into competition with the imported cheap and degraded labor of Asia, and yet our people have protested, and until recently, in vain against this Chinese immigration. We have shown that it does not assimilate and is not incorporated into the industrial system of the country.

You are now confronted with the same condition of things arising out of an invasion from another direction. A large part of this excessive immigration into New York, it is said, consists of contract laborers or hired slaves precisely as the Chinese are brought into San Francisco.

There has been an effort to restrict Chinese immigration, but the law is evaded. It is a fact that while prior to the adoption of the present law the average annual Chinese immigration into San Francisco was about eight thousand, yet under the operation of the present restriction law it amounted last year to about eleven thousand, so that this law that was intended to be restrictive has resulted in permitting an increase of immigration of these people whose labor is sold before they leave Hong-Kong. I am glad that this resolution has been brought forward, and I hope that the investigation will be thorough and cover the whole subject, including Chinese immigration to the Pacific coast, as well as the pauper labor from Europe. I hope the amendment limiting the expense of the select committee to $3,000 will not be adopted. Let the committee cover the whole ground, so that legislation may be had as fully as the subject demands.

Mr. FORD. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the previous question shall be ordered, there will be one-half hour for debate, I believe?

The SPEAKER. There will not be, as debate has already taken place. Under the rules of the House if no debate had occurred the gentleman's suggestion would be correct.

Mr. DINGLEY. But there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California just addressed the House on the subject. Other gentlemen have spoken upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman to give me five minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. DOCKERY. We do not want to debate the resolution, but to pass it, and not take up time talking about it.

Mr. FORD. I am sorry I can not yield.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let it be read.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was read, as follows:

And the expense of this investigation shall not exceed $3,000.

Mr. KERR. I wish to ask if the amendment proposed by myself to require a report at this session is not before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not move an amendment. The Chair stated at the time that there was an amendment then pending, and until it was disposed of another amendment would not be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will be given an opportunity to submit an amendment of that kind so that a report may be made at this session and that action may be taken promptly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, the House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be a limit imposed upon this expenditure. I ask that the limit may be $5,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

ADDITIONAL ROOM FOR DOORKEEPER.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Doorkeeper of the House, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rent some suitable building, or space in a building, for the remainder of the year 1888, to be used by him for additional accommodations for the folding-room. The expense of the same shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. There are certainly quite a number of buildings over on the ground we have bought for the Public Library which might be used for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state that the Committee on Printing has investigated that fact. The gentleman is mistaken when he states there is a building there which can be used for this purpose. We have endeavored to get one of the two buildings there, but have been informed by the commissioners for the Library that they need the two buildings there. They positively refuse to allow the Doorkeeper to have access to them. The folding-room here is full. The little room that they have on the Library ground is full of books. The Public Printer is ready and anxious to deliver to the Doorkeeper from five to six thousand copies per day of the agricultural report. The Doorkeeper is not able to receive them. There is nowhere they can be placed to which the Doorkeeper has access.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. A number of rooms have been rented in the Butler Building for the House. Those rooms certainly are not used. Can they not be obtained? No committee has met there since Congress began.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand those rooms are occupied by the committees of the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House. Is there objection to its present consideration?

A MEMBER on the Republican side. I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will not object, because if he does it will leave us nowhere to deliver the Agricultural Reports and the Cattle and Dairy Reports which the Public Printer is ready to deliver.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why can they not be sent out from the Printing Office?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Public Printer has nowhere to fold them. He can not deliver one day's work.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to know who objected. I saw no gentleman rise. I will state that these reports can not be folded at the Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee claims that no gentleman rose and made objection.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I rise to object, Mr. Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My question of order is that the regular order is the pending bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, which was under consideration on last Saturday; and that that regular order can not be dispensed with except by unanimous consent. The rule prescribes the order of business for days other than Monday. It says that after the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, or the call completed, the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee on being named shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill, etc.

The rules prescribe that after that order has been discharged the next business in order is to proceed to the consideration of unfinished business; and after the unfinished is disposed of the rule prescribes that the next thing in order is for the House to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering appropriation bills and revenue bills. The Speaker on last Friday held strictly in concurrence with the position I take.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the hour for the consideration of bills.
Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the hour be dispensed with.
Mr. STEELE. I object.
Mr. HOLMAN. Does it require unanimous consent to dispense with this hour?
The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will take but two or three minutes to dispose of the pending bill, and I insist it shall be disposed of now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided on several occasions that the hour for considering bills could be dispensed with, when a request was made for that purpose, only by unanimous consent. But there is another rule of the House to which the gentleman from Illinois did not call attention, and which the Chair will cause to be read, under which the motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is in order. If that motion is agreed to, the vote of the House of course dispenses with the order. If that motion is not agreed to, then the order must be proceeded with unless unanimous consent is given.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule XVI, clause 9. At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. This is an exception to the rule which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has read. That is a rule providing for going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally after unfinished business has been disposed of; but by the rule just read by the Clerk the additional special privilege is given to the Committee on Appropriations and to the Committee on Ways and Means to move, after the morning hour, to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of their bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If I understood the reading of that rule, it provides for going into Committee of the Whole after the unfinished business is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. No; after the morning hour, which is the hour for the call of committees.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I submit that there is a very flagrant conflict between the rule I have read and the one which the Clerk has just read.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to consume the time of the House on this matter. The pending bill will be disposed of in two or three minutes, and I ask the gentleman not to raise the question of consideration, but let the matter be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. From information which I have received since I objected, I think the resolution ought to pass, and I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue. The pending question is on the third section of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent, for the convenience of gentlemen on both sides of the House, that there shall be no vote taken on any part of the pending section to-day, but that the day shall be given to debate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I also ask consent that the dates in this section may be left open for the present.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman refers not only to the date in line 1, but also to the date in line 7.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir. We simply want to go on with the debate to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the dates in this section be left to be determined hereafter when that question is called up.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state for the information of the House, in view of the fact that there is to be no vote on the pending paragraph during the day, that it is unnecessary for members to move formal amendments. The Chair will recognize gentlemen for debate until the voting begins.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. With a view to shortening the debate, I wish to inquire of gentlemen on the other side if it will accord with their views to agree that there shall be a yea and nay vote in the House on the wool schedule?

Mr. MILLS. I am not authorized to make any agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that any agreement of that kind would have to be made in the House, as the committee can not bind the House.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I made the suggestion in order to ascertain the feeling of the gentlemen on the other side, and I understand that they refuse to entertain the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, on the left [Mr. PUGSLEY], desires to ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to address the committee not to exceed twenty minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Chairman, if there is any eloquence whatever in silence, I have heretofore been one of the most eloquent members of this House. On my arrival here I was informed by an old member that it was not considered good form for a new member to say much. He said if I would keep quiet and listen to him I might, perhaps, in the course of time, if I was duly attentive, know as much as he did. Unfortunately my limited stock of wisdom has not increased as rapidly as I hoped it would under that process, owing perhaps to a lack of absorbing power on my part. And so, as I represent a district which cast 37,000 votes, which is twelve times as many as are represented by each of twelve gentlemen here who have spoken about twelve times as often as the average of the remainder of the members, I venture a few remarks on the modest wool question, one in which my district is a good deal interested, although not to the extent of many other districts in the State, there being in the one I represent only about 120,000 sheep.

I do not desire to repeat the arguments that have been urged during the progress of this debate against the provision of the bill under consideration placing wool on the free-list, but to call the attention of the committee to one or two more evil results that would follow the adoption of that provision.

The destruction of the wool-growing industry in this country would not only be a loss to the farmer of the profits now derived from wool and mutton—it would have a tendency to impair to a very considerable extent the productive capacity of the soil, which is his only capital. There is no question of such vital importance to the farmer as the question of fertilization. How shall he preserve or improve the condition of his land? That is a question which is now presenting itself before the American farmer in the older States with startling clearness. It is one which he has hitherto considered but little. He has drawn with unsparing hand on the stores of fertility provided by nature in a new country. Even in Ohio, which is one of the best agricultural States and is so young that it is this year celebrating the centennial of its settlement, the farmers are warned by the diminished productiveness of the soil that their methods of farming must be changed. Less land must be plowed and cultivated and more devoted to pasture; less grain must be raised and sold and removed from the farm, and more must be consumed on the farm. The attention of the farmer must be given more than it hitherto has been to the raising of live-stock of a kind which will be most beneficial to his land. I submit to those at all acquainted with farming that there is no class of animals so useful as sheep for that purpose. There are none which can live so almost entirely on pasture, which require so little grain, which do so little injury by tramping, and which so quickly restore an apparently exhausted soil to a comparatively fertile condition.

This proposed legislation that would drive sheep out of this country would, I think, make unavailable a very large amount of the poorer lands of this country, and would at the same time be a serious blow at a great many farmers who, while they may not be in debt, have no surplus property to spare. It would have a destructive effect on some whom I represent. Two-thirds of the land in my district is remarkably fertile, affording every comfort to those who occupy it; but the remaining third is poor. It is poor naturally, or has been worn out by too much cultivation. It is nearly all occupied, however, and it is occupied by good, honest men. There is no way they can make a living out of those lands except by keeping sheep. Cattle, horses, and hogs require too much feed, especially grain. But by keeping a flock of from 50 to 200 sheep on such lands, and by moving them from one field to another, allowing each a sufficient rest from cultivation, a man can so improve the condition of his land as to enable him to raise the limited amount of grain required as breadstuff for his family, and also for his flock, his team, two or three cows, poultry, and enough swine to furnish him meat through the winter. From these sources and the fruit and vegetables he can raise, a poor man on a poor farm can live decently and raise his family decently.

I know a good many such men as that, and I have great respect for them. They are good citizens. They do their duty to the very best of their ability to their families, to their neighbors, and, when called upon, to their country. They are endeavoring to educate their children and to bring them up in the right way, and to elevate them to a position better than their own. I would not like to see the burden of those men, already heavy enough, made greater than they can bear. I would not like to see them driven from their humble but independent homes to become day laborers for others. But that would be the effect of the passage of this bill unamended in this particular. And not in my district only, but to a much greater extent in many other places scattered over the whole country. But, says the President of the United States, in substance, it can only injure the owner of fifty sheep to the amount of $36, and of a hundred sheep $72, and of two hundred sheep $144, and those sums are too insignificant to be permitted to stand in the way of an illustration of a great principle. They do seem small, and they are small to a gentleman with $50,000 a year salary, and $50,000 a year more for household expenses; but when they mean clothing, when they mean attendance in sickness, when they mean comforts and necessaries of which a man and his family would otherwise be deprived, they are not so insignificant; they are, on the contrary, of very great importance. But, say the free-traders, the farmer will get a cheaper blanket. Cheap blankets are a specialty with our Democratic friends. They seem to think that if a farmer can only wrap himself in a cheap blanket and stick a rooster's feather in his hair, and march around the country like an Indian, he will be all right. Where the money to buy the blanket is to come from after his business has been destroyed they fail to inform us. Even if under such circumstances he has the money to purchase blankets and clothing, he can buy goods made by our own manufacturers as cheaply as those made in England, and far cheaper than he could if without protection home competition were withdrawn.

We have heard a great deal here, from those whose principal interest in the farmer is to obtain his vote, about the depressed condition of agriculture. Whatever the truth about that may be, I can conceive of no action that can be taken by Congress better calculated to do the farmer a direct and serious injury than the destruction of the forty-four millions of sheep in this country. It will not aid our farmers if you transfer all the profits of that immense business to the farmers of Australia or the Argentine Republic. It will not benefit the other farmers in the United States, and certainly not the wool-growers, if you compel the million men now engaged in that industry to go into other branches of farming already sufficiently occupied and lower prices by overproduction.

The wool-growing industry is one which has in it hope for the future if properly protected. The present duty on wool should not only be retained, it should be increased, so that within a short time we will have one hundred millions instead of forty-four millions of sheep in this country, and two millions instead of one million men engaged in the business, and furnish the entire supply of wool required by our manufacturers.

It would prevent the deterioration of the soil; it would be to the advantage of all the farmers; it would add to the number of homes for the people and to the manufacturer, who should also have adequate protection; it would increase the home market, the value of which depends upon the prosperity of the people.

Mr. Chairman, while the bill now under consideration protects the Southern planter, its effects will certainly be, and its object seems to be, to injure the Northern farmer by placing many of his most important products in competition with those of the cheap land and labor of other countries. The protection he has hitherto enjoyed is to be withheld, and the doors are to be thrown wide open to all who may choose to pour their surplus agricultural products in upon us. Notwithstanding the hypocritical lamentations that have been uttered and the crocodile tears that have been shed over the Northern farmers by the majority of this House, there is no other class so discriminated against, and whose rights are so disregarded, and yet they comprise a large proportion of the best, most substantial, and patriotic citizens of the country. The purpose would appear to be to arouse in them antagonism to those engaged in manufactures, and to secure their assistance in forcing upon all the advent of free trade. If I know those whom I represent, and their views accord with those of farmers generally, it will not be accomplished. They are fully informed as to their own interests. They know the better market protection will give them, and how it will enhance the value of their lands more to have a great manufacturing establishment with thousands of employés in their immediate neighborhood, or as near as possible to them in their own country, rather than in Europe. They know it is better that one-third of the people should be producers, and two-thirds consumers of what they raise than that all should be producers. They know that they can buy cheaper and sell dearer under protection than under free trade. They know that, if the mere 6 per cent. of their produce that is sold abroad and comes in competition with the produce of cheaper labor and cheaper lands, decreases the price of the 94 per cent. sold at home, it would be well for them if the fostering hand of the Government was still further extended to develop other manufactures that can be carried on successfully in this country, so that the increased number of employés and consumers would require the 6 per cent. now exported, and relieve the farmers from that unworthy competition. They know their welfare is dependent on that of all other citizens, and they will adhere to the policy of protection for themselves and for all. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that since the election of Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency the Republican party in this House has placed itself in a most illogical position on the tariff question. It has admitted in the Tariff Commission report and in various ways that some revision of the tariff, so as to reduce unnecessary taxation and prevent the still further growth of the surplus in the Treasury, was called for. Yet they have refused to make any revision themselves, or to consent to any revision to be made by anybody else, which looks to the reduction of duties confessedly too large, and not required for any legitimate governmental purpose.

In my service in this House for eight years under two Republican administrations I do not remember having had any like experience. Heretofore whatever party was in power some attempt has been made to correct what was wrong and bring about a better condition of affairs; but at the present time the policy of the Republican party seems to be to create a feeling of general dissatisfaction in Congress and throughout the country, apparently without regard to results and which can lead to no possible good. The Democrats can not be expected to be overjoyed at the complications which arise out of such a condition of public affairs. They have honestly attempted to bring the administration of the Government to a peace basis, and to strictly confine all Departments and officers to the exercise of their proper functions, and they find themselves obstructed in the accomplishment of this good work by the course pursued by the Republican party, which gives itself up to the expression of furious opposition when any member on this side of the House seeks to say anything with reference to the tariff, or prevent, as far as possible, extravagant appropriations of the people's money and keep taxation within proper bounds. While the surplus revenue has grown beyond all precedent, and while there is serious apprehension throughout the whole country that it may lead to deplorable results, yet when we attempt to bring about some adjustment of this unfortunate state of affairs we are denounced as enemies of American labor!

Now, every sensible man knows that without the votes of American laborers not many of us on this side would hold a seat in this House. We are in fact indebted to them for our seats on this floor, and we have received their votes because the history of the country shows that the Democratic party has always favored legislation having in view the best interests of the whole people. It can not be that we would willingly cast aside the support upon which we depend. In point of fact both President and members of Congress look for an indorsement from the people whose votes they require if they hope to succeed, and they would avoid as an act of supreme folly the advocacy of any measure which would tend even indirectly to the injury of labor or the laboring man in this country.

Whether I speak or remain silent I am liable to misconstruction, but I am not deterred by that fact from doing what I believe to be my duty. At the risk therefore of being called a free-trader—which I certainly am not; and of being called an enemy of American labor and the American laborer—which would be untrue and without a shadow of foundation—I will venture to express my views on the pending proposition reported from the Committee on Ways and Means for the revision of the tariff.

It is admitted on both sides of the House, or it is at least not denied, that the surplus revenue in the National Treasury is at present so large and has continued to increase so steadily that it has become a serious inconvenience and embarrassment, if not a positive menace, to our business interests. The burning question of the hour, therefore, is, what shall be done by Congress? It should provide a remedy for this recognized evil with the least possible delay and in the most effective manner, looking to the general welfare and not merely to special interests.

It is not contended anywhere, or by any one, that it is the right of any government, national, State, city, or town, to tax the people beyond what is actually necessary for a proper and economical administration of the Government. To do so is not only in defiance of ordinary business rules, but is a gross breach of trust on the part of the legislative body that indulges in such a course. Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation; and the moment it is discovered it becomes the duty of Congress to see that the evil is removed and is prevented from increasing.

In a word, Mr. Chairman, it may be said as an axiomatic truth, that in a country like ours, with a population of over sixty millions of people, development taking place in all sections of the country, that the amount of money we have is a fair measure of the needs and necessities of active and successful enterprise. Money is to ordinary business what blood is to the life of the human body. If we lessen the amount of blood we impair the functions of life and strength and we open the way to the very worst possible consequences.

So to take out of the channels of trade the money which is their lifeblood, and to keep on sapping the whole business system of the country by hoarding that money and withdrawing it from its fair use and office, is a crime as well as a blunder. It is in opposition to the truths of economic history of every people, and destructive in its tendencies in whatever way it may be looked at, or with whatever analogies it may be compared and tested.

Now, a growing surplus revenue influences the money market unfavorably by increasing the price of money and the rate of interest, and as a consequence restrains and lessens, if it does not paralyze and destroy, business interests. It at once arouses suspicion and destroys confidence, and the injurious results can be measured only by the extent to which the evil is permitted to exist. As an evidence of this fact let me state that one firm doing business in Boston to the amount of $10,000,000 annually, has been lost to that city in consequence of a change in the rate of interest. It is equally valuable to notice what has recently taken place by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in complying with the law. As soon as he began to buy bonds the rate of interest fell from 5 to 3 per cent., and this within one week. It clearly demonstrated the beneficial effect of reducing the plethora of money in the Treasury and increasing the supply of money in the country for the ordinary purposes of business.

It exhibited the danger of hoarding money and the consequent disadvantage to merchants, of whom 90 per cent., at some time during the year, are obliged to borrow money, and upon whom an advanced rate of interest results in loss, and sometimes in ruin. Of course failures and financial embarrassments are largely due to speculation; but in this connection I do not include any such consideration, but confine myself at present to the influence which the withdrawal of money from the channels of trade and hoarding it in the Treasury has, in increasing the rate of interest, thereby imparing the free movement and success of business; while, on the contrary, the limitation of revenue to the actual wants of the Government and allowing the country to expect a profit by the use of the remaining money which fairly belongs to it, will lower the rate of interest and improve confidence, and preserve a better tone, and secure a larger and more general prosperity.

I came to this Congress committed to my constituents upon a principle, and to which my party was committed, and that was to provide in the best way and at the earliest moment for the reduction of the surplus revenue of the Government. The attention of Congress was called to this matter in the most urgent and emphatic terms by the President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional power, to inform it of the condition of the country and to recommend what in his judgment was the best course to pursue. Immediately after the organization of this House and the appointment of committees, the Committee of Ways and Means earnestly devoted itself to the preparation of a measure providing for a readjustment of duties and a reduction of revenue, for the purpose of doing away with the surplus. That committee reported a bill to the House as a result of their labors and as the very best measure they could suggest. It is pending in this House, and demands our attention and our action.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, action upon it can not longer be deferred, as the session is drawing to a close. It is the only measure we have before us, and it must be taken for granted that it is the best one under the circumstances, or else if there were a better one, which would more certainly secure the end we are trying to reach, it would have been presented before this. But the bill of the committee is the only bill before this House. I shall therefore support it to the best of my ability as the only way open to me as a member of this House to meet the pledges I have made to the people and discharge my sworn duty to the country.

I do not propose to take up and consider every item of a long bill like this, but rather come at once to the subject under discussion.

The question of wool, upon which there has been so much said, seems to my mind to be so plain that I wonder there can be any difference of opinion about it. I am informed that the world's annual production of wool is consumed within the same period, and as we only raise 300,000,000 pounds of wool or wool-tops, I can not see what particular danger to our wool interest there can be, or why there should be any objection to allowing the wool that we need in our manufactures to come in free of duty. It is absolutely required in our manufactures, and will be imported whether the duty is more or less. Our wool will be used for the purpose to which it is adapted, but it does not begin to supply, either in extent or quality, the wool which our improvement and advance in the manufacture of woolen goods require to compete with the finer quality of woolen goods imported from abroad. I am satisfied, therefore, should this bill pass, the production of wool in this country will find a larger market and a better price than it does now, because the increased manufacture of woolen goods will increase the demand for our own wool; and the necessity on our part of competing successfully with a higher quality of imported woolen goods will be assisted in the accomplishment of that end by obtaining the finer wool at a cheaper rate, while at the same time the wool-growing interest will be kept up and stimulated in the larger demand which must necessarily arise out of more extensive and better woolen manufactures.

I know that every manufacturer believes, as I do, that it would be in the interest of every woolen manufacturer to have free wool. The only fear threatened by the opponents of the measure seems to be that what may follow, not by the passage of this bill, but at some future time the Democrats intend to make woolens free as well as wool. Now, without discussing this point politically, it seems to me that the Republican party, claiming to be able to control the next House, ought not to fear the passage of this bill, as they could easily prevent the passage of an act for free woolens, which was never thought of or intended by us. It is claimed that free wool will affect the price of American wool and thereby injure the American wool producer. Everybody knows that wool can be most profitably raised where land is the cheapest. I have no doubt we could raise more wool in this country than we do now, but the farmer may find it more profitable to occasionally kill a lamb and sell the meat than to procure the wool.

I am in receipt of a letter from a personal friend, together with a statement from the New York Economist, showing what, in his opinion, the effect of free wool would be, which I beg to insert in my remarks.

I have also another communication giving figures of the cost of making the goods under a free-wool system. We know what the effect has been of the abolition of the duty on hides. Scarcely a ship sails out of the port of Boston without carrying as a part of its cargo American leather, a part of which is manufactured by William Titt & Sons, personal friends of my colleague, Mr. HAYDEN, and supporters of my colleague, Mr. LODGE, who, I understand, export two-thirds of their production.

This is only one case, and I believe a relative and a personal friend of Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. John Cummings, is doing a large business in the same line.

The importation of hides free of duty not only did not in any way lessen the cost of or decrease the market for our own hides, but by diminishing the cost to those engaged in the manufacture of the article, it stimulated and enlarged that manufacture, and by making a larger demand for the domestic article of hides, increased the market for them.

I believe the introduction of free wool will enable us to supply at least 25 per cent. more of the woolen goods we consume than we ever did before. It accomplishes, therefore, the very purpose we have in view, because it has the double effect of reducing the revenue, which we do not need for any legitimate purpose, and it improves and extends at the same time the fineness and quality of our woolen goods and enlarges the demand for the home product. Considering in every point of view the free importation of wool, where we can get it best and cheapest, will have the effect to benefit and not to injure either our home productions or our home market—as in the case of the importation of free hides from other countries, the effect of which has been beneficial in a very marked degree. It is certainly true that our manufacture of woolen goods is improving in quality, finish, and style, and with proper facilities furnished to it, of the raw material it requires, at the cheapest rates, we must necessarily assist and not retard its growth; and every sense of justice of what is right would prompt us in this reasonable and just mode to help our own woolen manufactures in their competition to supply our home market with a better class of goods which, as we know, to a very large extent, is supplied now by importation of woolen goods from abroad.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman claim that the free importation of wool will make the price of wool grown in this country greater or less?

Mr. MORSE. I claim that none of the wool which we import today conflicts directly with the American wool, because it is of different fiber and different quality; and if we can get wool from abroad free, I believe that by the mixture of foreign wool with American wool, enabling us to manufacture more woolen goods, we shall naturally use more of our American wool.

Mr. ARNOLD. Do you not believe that when wool is imported free we shall soon be receiving the woolen goods from abroad free?

Mr. MORSE. I do not think that is a fair question. We raise revenue by a tariff largely in textile fabrics; that is our policy. We make wool free as a raw material, as we believe, in the interest of manufacturers and wool-growers both. It is not to be expected that we will at any time refuse a reasonable protection to labor employed in manufacturing.

Mr. ARNOLD. The woolen manufacturers are afraid of free wool, because they are afraid of free woolen goods later on.

Mr. MORSE. I have answered you. That is my statement.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Have you considered the effect of free wool upon the sheep industry from the American standpoint?

Mr. MORSE. There is no question in my mind that by permitting the importation of wool free we can make here woolen goods of the classes we now import, and by reason of the increase of our woolen manufactures here the American wool-grower will be in as good a condition as he is now if not better.

Mr. WILKINS. I wish to put to the gentleman a question for information. He states that we must have wool from abroad to be mixed with our own wool in order to manufacture certain classes of goods. I would like him to explain what kind of wool we must import for the purpose of mixing it with American wool, and what kind of goods would then be manufactured.

Mr. MORSE. The suit I now wear is an example of cloth made of mixed wools. It is a worsted that could not be made of the common American fleece. Fashion is capricious. Manufacturers must make what the trade requires and to do that they must have choice of wools.

Mr. WILKINS. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts means to say that the foreign wool must be imported free, in order to enable us to manufacture worsted goods.

Mr. MORSE. For the manufacture of many kinds of worsted goods, and also for the production of much of the goods for women's wear.

Mr. WILKINS. Dress goods?

Mr. MORSE. Dress goods of many kinds. American wool alone can not produce satisfactory results in this class of goods.

Mr. WILKINS. Does the gentleman say that we can not manufacture from American wool as good worsteds as can be manufactured from any imported wools?

Mr. MORSE. That is exactly what I claim; that the American wool alone can not be used so as to produce goods of the class of that which I am now wearing.

Mr. WILKINS. Of what wool is that manufactured? Where does the wool grow?

Mr. MORSE. I believe it is Australian wool. The gentleman might as well claim that our carpets can be manufactured from American wool. Why are not carpets made out of the wools we produce here?

Mr. WILKINS. We do make carpets out of wools produced here.

Mr. MORSE. The records show that in the manufacture of carpets in the United States 90 per cent. of the wool used is imported.

Mr. WILKINS. I agree that we do manufacture carpets from imported wools——

Mr. MORSE. But I go further.

Mr. WILKINS. But we also manufacture carpets from wool raised in the United States, in Arizona, New Mexico, etc. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. MORSE. But what percentage of our carpets are manufactured from such wool?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. There are 32,000,000 pounds of our wool used.

Mr. MORSE. I have not time to yield indefinitely in this way. My point is that in the carpets made in the United States 90 per cent. of the wool is imported.

There is another consideration, general in its character, which seems to have been lost sight of in the discussions which have taken place on this subject. We should not forget there has been marked improvement and advance in every field of human labor, and that through the inventive genius of our own people we have been able to increase the outcome at less cost than ever before. This, taken in connection with the better methods of business, has not been without beneficial results. Take as a single instance the machinery of a mill built thirty years ago and contrast it with one built within the last five years. In the latter case the new mill could be run at a profit, while the old one would be run at a loss or not at all. We are not only better manufacturers but we are also better merchants. Competition has become closer and sharper, and we are compelled to take advantage of every facility we can command in the transaction of our business and the exercise of an economy which avoids every expense found to be unnecessary. The merchant strives to deliver his goods directly from the purchaser to the consumer. The middleman has therefore disappeared from view.

Mr. ARNOLD. As a matter of fact, if the woolen manufacturer wants improved machinery does he not send to Belgium or England to procure it?

Mr. MORSE. I am aware of that fact; yet now, when we are trying to give you the privilege of importing machinery free, you object.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will not that machinery over there produce, with the same amount of labor, as much cloth per hour as it will produce in the United States?

Mr. MORSE. Does the gentleman mean to inquire whether the same labor and the same machinery employed over there will produce as much as here?

Mr. ARNOLD. Exactly.

Mr. MORSE. We gentlemen on opposite sides of the House disagree entirely on that point. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] mentioned the other day a case of this kind, showing that shoemaking machinery used in England produced but 47 per cent. as many shoes per day as similar machines produced in the United States.

I know something about this matter from my own experience. I was born abroad and came here at the age of seventeen years, landing at Castle Garden from an emigrant ship. I had no relatives dependent upon me, I was free to act for myself, and I was able to lay by money. Immigrants are usually the young, the ambitious, and enterprising; they are stimulated by their opportunities; their labor here is far superior to what it would be at home. They leave behind those whose entanglements or lack of enterprise hamper them, and the man on this side of the water is worth twice as much as the other.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] claim that a loom running eighty picks per minute in Belgium will produce less cloth per hour than a loom which runs the same number of picks per minute in the United States?

Mr. MORSE. The gentleman from Rhode Island might as well suppose all the conditions of labor to be the same in Belgium as they are here. That machinery runs at our speed and people work with our ambition——

Mr. ARNOLD. But the gentleman should remember——

Mr. MORSE. Permit me to finish my statement. Here our operatives, under the stimulus of which I have spoken, work at high speed and full time. They are promptly on hand when the bell rings, and stay until 6 o'clock in the evening, when the bell rings again. They work steadily, and without the numerous holidays, irregularities, and interruptions which interfere with the productiveness of labor on the other side. If the gentleman means to make it appear that under existing management and arrangements the same results are produced abroad as here, I deny it. I claim, and can prove, that under our system we produce better results from our machines than are produced on the other side.

Mr. FELTON. Then the matter depends upon the management?

Mr. MORSE. It depends in a measure upon the difference of climate, the ambition of the workmen, and also on the fact that our institutions are different here; our laborers are more independent——

Mr. COCKRAN. Here they have hope.

Mr. MORSE. Yes; they have the chance of a future; the employé has the hope of becoming an employer, as I have done, though I had but little expectation of doing it when I landed in America.

When I began business my goods were purchased of a jobber. He bought of a commission house, and that commission house obtained its goods from the manufacturer. Since then the process has changed, and instead of buying from a jobber, and he from the manufacturer, I buy from the manufacturer directly, and save the expense of different shipments and the incidents of freight, cartage, insurance, and bookkeeping at the several places, and reduce the cost by saving the three profits of these middlemen. That is to say, that now, with my present business under the system of to-day, I save these three profits. I can purchase cheaper from the manufacturers direct than I could——

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then three men are turned out of employment.

Mr. MORSE. Oh! now, we are not talking buncombe, but solid facts.

I can not make money unless I buy my goods direct from the manufacturer.

Mr. ARNOLD. You buy your goods from the manufacturer enough cheaper to save the expense of the middlemen.

Mr. MORSE. Well, I hardly claim that; I buy them cheaper, of course. If I buy direct from friend ARNOLD I will get them from him cheaper than if he sold them to A, and A sold them to B, and I purchased from B.

Mr. ARNOLD. You save three profits.

Mr. MORSE. Yes, I am saving something. I do not want to advertise my business too much; but it enables me to sell these "$10 suits." [Laughter and applause.]

We have in addition better facilities of travel and carriage by rail and steam-boat for the delivery of goods. Steam and electricity supply us with the very latest information, and we know up to the last moment where we can buy cheapest and sell at the best profits. This enables us to manufacture goods at less cost and to sell them at reduced rates. It enables us also to avoid loss by bad debts, which is an item in successful management. Twenty-five years ago, when I did only one-quarter of my present business, the percentage of loss was five times as great as it is at present, because of this item, and such I have no doubt is the experience of the merchants generally.

We are doing business upon a far better system than formerly.

We were formerly obliged to sell on six, eight, and ten months' credit, and pay from 8 to 12 per cent. for money, but owing to the facilities to which I have just referred, and the economies and better methods of business adopted, we have sold goods for nearly cash, and borrowed money at one-half the former rate of interest.

Money has accumulated in this country, and as a general rule the country is more prosperous. But we are endeavoring to aid it still further by giving free wool to the American manufacturer, which will still further enlarge the field of American industry, and help our people. You keep threatening us all the time with your free whisky when we do not want it, and you refuse free wool. Now take some of our Democratic medicine. [Laughter.] It may do somebody some good. We believe it will. We do not want your free whisky.

But besides these things, the American market has changed. Formerly money was less abundant here and all over the world. Now it must be actively used, and men with capital have the control. No man to-day can do a successful business on the credit system. He can not buy upon credit and succeed. The point I wish to make is that in the interest of business we must collect only money enough to meet the requirements of economical administration, and instead of millions of money hoarded in the Treasury it should be in the active channels of trade, in the pockets of the people.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. How much surplus would the gentleman take off? Fifty millions?

Mr. MORSE. Pardon me; but do not answer your own question. Reduction of surplus must depend upon existing conditions. We are fighting for a principle in this bill which you claim is a wrong one. Now, the amount of surplus to be taken off depends entirely upon what the requirements of the Government may be from day to day and from year to year. The Treasury may be in such a condition next year that it will require more money. Suppose, for instance, a war should break out——

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. But we have not any war now. Therefore I ask the gentleman how much of the surplus he would take off?

Mr. MORSE. All that is in the Treasury, not required to meet legitimate purposes. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. But how much is that?

Mr. MORSE. Well, I am not a statistician. The gentleman must find the figures for himself.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. You claim, or your bill claims, that it should be reduced fifty millions.

Mr. MORSE. Well, do you object to that?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. No, I do not; but you do.

Mr. MORSE. Oh, no; that is just what we are trying to do.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. You had the opportunity to take that amount off of sugar the other day and absolutely refused.

Mr. MORSE. Yes; we refused your method of reduction on sugar, rice, and all that; but you must bear in mind, my friend, that we claim as much patriotism and honesty in the management of the affairs of this Government on this side of the House, and on the part of the men who framed this bill, as you do. We believe that there is a method of doing this which will do injustice to none and will be of advantage to all. We have got opinions of our own, and we have put them into this bill, and we propose to go before the country upon them. [Applause.] Now, you can go to the country on your opinions and we will go on ours. You can say that if you had had your way—which you did not—when you go on the stump in Indiana for re-election, that you would have put sugar on the free-list. I am willing to grant you that much. We are willing to go upon the bill as it stands.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. So are we.

Mr. MORSE. Very well.

Nor should we forget, Mr. Chairman, to take into account in summing up the results the vast and abiding influence which immigration has had in building up this great country. Who can tell the enormous advantages which have been brought to use in opening up to settlement the wild regions of the West and Southwest by these bands of immigrants? They have come to us in the bloom of their lives, and they have brought to us the labor which we needed. In their effort to make homes for themselves they have built up our waste places, and in many instances have established commonwealths which to-day are not only the strength and support of our free system of government but the pride and the glory of every American citizen.

Suppose, for example, a man owned the best gold mine in the world and yet had no one to work it for him or to purchase his product, what would the mine be worth to him? Nothing! We have vast resources, and those have been opened up by these immigrants. They have not only brought us their labor, but they have brought us their knowledge in reference to their special productions, the value of which can hardly be overestimated. It must therefore be apparent to every one that our prosperity is not altogether due to the tariff laws.

Gentlemen on this floor, in the flush of fervid declamation, talk of the mask being taken off of the Democratic party, just as if the Democratic party was sailing under false colors or pretending to be what it is not!

It is no answer to denounce Democrats as free-traders simply because they wish to reduce revenue taxation to the point where it will supply the legitimate demands of the Government, while it will not be hurtful to the people. Nor is it true, however often it may be alleged, that we owe all our prosperity to tariff laws, and that any change in those laws will be disastrous. Our prosperity is the result of our natural resources, energy, industry, economy, and justice, and it would be unsafe to depend upon any other than these old-fashioned and reliable principles for the preservation of good government.

No man can justly accuse me, as a Democrat, of failing to appreciate the wants of the country, or lacking in disposition to do that which is right and proper to be done. Still engaged in business, can it be believed I would willingly depreciate the value of my own property and advocate what I know must lead to that end?

If I had the least fear the pending bill would have any such consequence I would not vote for it. If I believed it would reduce the wages of the laboring men of the country or bring distress upon those who are engaged in manufactures or any other industries, I would be the last man on this floor to support it. Such is not my belief; but on the contrary I am firmly convinced, by every consideration which I have been able to give the subject, it will very materially help all classes and all industries by preventing stagnation of business and bringing about a more just and better condition of affairs by removing out of the way a surplus revenue hoarded in the Treasury and standing an object of apprehension and a means of temptation to legislation of the most questionable character.

In this connection a great deal is said about England, English markets, and English sympathies, and that all this legislation is for the benefit of England. By inquiry made, and the general public opinion seems to be that this very President of ours is an American, and strange it is that he should recommend only such legislation as will benefit others only and not our own people.

We have been told, also, this bill is a Presidential measure. It certainly was the duty of the President under his oath to inform Congress of the peril to our business interests and to our prosperity as a people which was apparent to every other citizen of intelligence, however humble his position might be. An effort was made in the Forty-ninth Congress to reach some mode of adjustment, but the Morrison bill was defeated, and various reasons were assigned for its defeat. It was said if it had been passed the consequences would have been so disastrous that it would result in the overthrow of the Democratic party. If the passage of the present bill would restore the Republican party to power, it seems to me we would not hear such furious opposition to it. In my judgment they do not really believe any such thing. At all events, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party shows its confidence in the pending measure and in its justice by risking their ascendency as a party upon its success.

The use of this bill as an opportunity to attack the President is no new feature in the course of his opponents. His bold and manly conduct, his frank, open, and straightforward course, his stainless and admitted integrity, have not sufficed to save him from the attacks of carping critics and the bitterness of political opponents. Were he a prophet, and endowed with more than human wisdom, his judgment would fail to please his censors, and the oftener he was justified by the event the more constant would be their petty attempts to falsify his motives, to pervert his attitude, and to rob him of his just dues.

We had an experience of this when first he took the office. The Senate resolutions are well remembered, which called in question his reasons for certain removals from office, and demanded all private correspondence in cases of dismissal, and all know how this political dragnet failed to secure the hoped-for advantage.

The petty hue and cry about pension vetoes at times makes itself heard even at the present day; yet there is no one who has read the vetoes, unless blinded by partisanship, who can deny that the President has merely exercised that ordinary prudence and discretion which the responsibility of his office demands, and that he has differed from former Presidents only in refusing to sign fraudulent or improper bills or to pass them without examination as being too much trouble.

Then there was the battle-flag incident, with its three kinds of palsy, an incident which must bring the blush of shame to all who remember their attempt to use it for political advantage. Again, the President of the United States, as the representative of this great nation, as an act of international courtesy sent as a gift to the Pope a copy of the Constitution of the United States. To what straits a party is reduced who makes this an accusation! Yet we were solemnly told that this would bring into the Republican ranks every religious denomination outside of the Roman Catholic Church!

Now with equal grace comes the storm of denunciation upon the President's tariff message, which to every friendly mind, to every unbiased person, it is as clear as the sun in the heavens that the President was actuated only by the deepest conviction and the highest sense of the duty he owed to the country, when he reported to Congress, in language which could not be misunderstood, the crying evil brought upon the country by unnecessary taxation, pointed out the necessity of prompt action, and suggested the remedy.

I believe the country to be in full sympathy with the passage of a bill reducing the income of the Government to actual requirements. Of course the Republican party will continue to oppose the passage of the bill in every way. If the bill is wrong, why do they not submit a better one? They have not done so, although they clamor so loudly against the one which is pending. If it will have the effect to destroy values, to close factories, to throw labor out of employment, to reduce the wages of labor now employed; if all this is to follow, it ought to be shown, and the Republican party by its representatives should bring in some proposition to accomplish the object to be attained, without leading to all these disastrous consequences! Yet they have not done this, nor will they, because it will expose at once the groundlessness of all their charges and insinuation against the President, against the action of the Committee on Way and Means in this House, and against the Democratic party generally.

If I believed the resolutions of my old friend, formerly a member of this House, Ex-Governor Foster, wherein he stated the message of the President and the bill of the Ways and Means Committee are a direct and open assault upon American industries, which, if unresisted, must lead to free trade and paralyze business, I would oppose them to the best of my ability, and failing to resist the passage of such a bill, I would sever my connection with a party which could be guilty of such an enormity. But I do not believe any such thing, and am only astonished that a great party should be reduced to making such statements to meet the exigencies of an impending Presidential campaign. In my judgment the American laborer will not be humbugged by any such nonsense, nor will such course of action satisfy him that the Republican party is his friend, and that the Democrats, contrary to all reason and in absolute defiance of their own interest and their own success, are marching with open eyes to ruin.

APPENDICES.

COST STATEMENT FOR MAY, 1888.

	Cost per yard.
Labor	25.3
Dyestuffs	1.5
Wool oil	2.2
Machinery oil	.5
Soap	1.5
General and traveling expense	.4
Freight	.8
Fuel	.7
Rent, insurance, and taxes	4.9
Allowances for imperfect goods	3.0
Total	40.5

In the items of dyestuffs, wool oil, machinery oil, and soap are included supplies that are used in dye-house, card-room, and finishing-room, such as belting, card-clothing, flocks, brooms, twine, and paper.

BOSTON, July 7, 1888.

Hon. LEOPOLD MORSE:

DEAR SIR: I forgot to say in my letter to you to-day that the labor in a yard of cassimere, such as are made at the mill I am a director in, costs no more than it does in a yard of British goods of the same quality, although we pay nominally 25 to 50 per cent. more by the day or week. Mr. Robert Bleakie will assure you that such is the fact. It is only about 18 per cent. of the cost of the goods. The manager and treasurer of our * * * mill is a rank Republican and does not want any change in the tariff, as he says we are doing well and always have made money—why not let well enough alone? He says he fears free goods soon if we have free wool now. That is a poor argument, but it is the only one they have. With 40 per cent. duty on the goods and free wool we can almost or quite compete with the foreign goods if they pay nothing for labor and we pay the same as now.

BOSTON, July 9, 1888.

Hon. LEOPOLD MORSE:

MY DEAR SIR: I wrote you Saturday giving you the cost of fancy cassimeres in the United States in comparison with the cost in England and Scotland, and explaining the advantage the Americans would have over the British under the "Mills bill." I find to-day a statement in the New York Economist of the comparative cost of another article of woolen goods largely manufactured here. You will see by the statement if we had free wool we could make these goods less than they can, and compete with them without any duty; but the duty would be 40 per cent., or 27.96 cents per pound. Supposing we paid double the price for labor that they do, we should still have a margin of profit with 40 per cent. duty, as in the Mills bill.

I inclose the statement.

BOSTON, July 7, 1888.

Hon. LEOPOLD MORSE:

Perhaps I can give you some information of the cost of manufacturing woolen goods that may interest you. * * * The statement is correct, but varies from month to month a trifle. The item of labor varies from 22½ to 25 cents per yard. Other items may vary in about the same proportion, but the entire cost of the goods, except wool, varies from 40 to 50 cents, unless there is silk in them. This is for a fancy cassimere that sells for $1.70 to $1.75 by the case. I have been a director in this mill for the last fifteen years, and am fully posted. I inclose a statement received from the mill of the cost for manufacturing for May. You will see that the item of labor is only 25.3 cents, which is as large as any month in the year; generally is about 23 cents. Some of the other items are generally a trifle larger. I will give you the cost at the mill.

Scoured wool, 26 ounces, at 3½ cents per ounce	91.0
Labor, as per statement	25.3
Other items, as per statement (no silk in these goods)	15.2
	131.5

It costs us, with the discounts, to sell these goods about 16 per cent., so you see the profit is small.

Now supposing we had free wool, the cost would be about as follows, if we paid the same for labor:

Scoured wool, 26 ounces, at 2½ cents per ounce	65.0
Labor, as per statement	25.3
Other items	15.2
	105.5

Now let us see what the English or Scotch goods would cost, laid down here with 40 per cent. duty in accordance with the Mills bill:

Wool, the same as here, 26 ounces at 2½ cents per ounce	65.00
Labor, say 50 per cent. less (but it is not per yard any less) about	12.50
Other items about the same as they cost here	15.20
Add 40 per cent. duty on cost of goods there	37.00
	129.70

Therefore you see we can make the goods here 24.20 cents less than a foreign article of the same quality can be laid down here, if we have free wool, and still pay the same as we are now paying for labor.

I am surprised that any manufacturer of fancy cassimeres in the country should oppose the Mills bill. I think they would not if they were not blinded by political prejudice. I sincerely hope the Mills bill, or something similar embracing raw materials on the free-list, will become a law, but I fear it will fail in the Senate.

WOOLEN MANUFACTURES—COMPARATIVE COST OF MANUFACTURING ALL-WOOL DRESS GOODS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, June 30.

Consul Schoenhof at Tunstall, England, has furnished the State Department, under date of June 5, 1888, with a very interesting and instructive comparison of the cost of manufacturing all-wool dress goods in America and in England. The goods selected for comparison are known as "sackings." In America they are largely used for ladies' dress. They are made of carded wool, and are of plain flannel weave. They represent, therefore, flannel manufacturing in the different items of labor as well as sackings or ladies' cloth.

The American mill selected for comparison uses mostly Ohio and Michigan X fleeces, the price of which at the time Mr. Schoenhof's calculations were made stood at 35 cents per pound. A shrinkage of 60 per cent. takes place in the scouring and manufacturing, which brings the cost of the wool in the cloth to 70 cents per pound. The cost of carding, spinning, weaving, dyeing, and finishing was obtained by dividing the actual expenditures for these several purposes for half a year by the number of pounds of finished product turned out in that time; and the additional charges per pound of cloth, including general office expenses, rent, insurance, taxes, and interest, were ascertained in the same way.

a. The total cost in Massachusetts per manufactured pound of goods as described, i. e., all-wool sackings used for ladies' dress goods, is as follows:

		Cents.
1. Wool		70.00
2. Carding, including scouring		3.00
3. Spinning		2.85
4. Weaving, labor:
a. Dressing and warping	1.06
b. Weaving	6.90	9.62
c. Burling and mending, loom fixers, and overseers' pay	.66
5. Supplies		.85
6. Dyeing		1.90
7. Finishing		2.60
8. Additional charges		11.40
Total cost per pound		102.31

Cost of manufacturing, exclusive of wool, 32.31 cents.

The English mill with which the comparison was made used Cape or Sydney wool, for which they paid 6½ pence, or 13 cents per pound. This wool yields 6½ pounds of cloth to 16 pounds of grease wool. The wool would then stand 16 ence, or 32 cents per pound in the cloth.

b. The total cost in England per manufactured pound of all-wool sackings, used for ladies' dress goods, was as follows:

		Cents.
1. Wool		32.00
2-3. Carding, scouring, and spinning		4.00
4. Weaving—
a. and c. Dressing, etc	1.33	7.40
b. Weaving	6.07
5. Supplies		1.50
6. Dyeing		8.00
7. Finishing		4.00
8. Charges		13.00
Total cost per pound		69.90

Cost of manufacturing, exclusive of wool, 37.90 cents.

In England, in weaving, each operator operates only one loom against two in America in this class of goods.

In corroboration of this statement, Mr. Schoenhof furnishes a statement from another mill in Leeds. They used New South Wales greasy lambs' pieces and locks, of which the present price is 5½ pence, or 11 cents per pound. This wool shrinks in manufacturing nearly 75 per cent.

c. The total cost per pound of sackings at this mill was as follows:

		Cents.
1. Wool		43.60
2-3. Labor up to weaving		4.35
Supplies, machinery, coal, etc		12.80
4. Weaving, labor		9.15
Weaving, machinery		6.50
Milling and other sundries		1.01
Labor sundries		5.20
6. Dyeing		11.10
7. Finishing (60 per cent. labor)		7.16

Cost of manufacturing, exclusive of wool, 57.27 cents.

The manufacturer has calculated here the supplies, item 5 in the previous statements, and the charges, item 8 in the previous statements, in with each separate manufacturing process, and profit and discount in with the general charges. Mr. Schoenhof deducts 7½ per cent. for discount and 10½ per cent. for profit, making the manufacturing cost per pound 40.25 cents. Mr. Schoenhof says that he only introduces this statement in corroboration of the first, which he had examined personally and obtained the items in more specified form. The latter account was mailed to him after he left Leeds.

The close approximation of two accounts from different parties unknown to each other as furnishing the information, he considers valuable confirmation of general correctness. "Mathematical accuracy," he adds, "can only be obtained where, as in America, one mill makes one class of goods only, and then only with mental reservations, as even here different kinds of goods though of the same class are turned out in the year's run. But if we come within a fraction of a cent for each manufacturing operation in all-wool dress goods to reliable information of comparative values, we have covered all that can be reasonably expected for the purpose of this inquiry."

Mr. Schoenhof says:

"The weaving wages per pound of finished cloth are nearly the same as in America. The running yard shows more difference. The American goods of which my samples are 50 inches wide; the English are 54 inches wide. The 54-inch goods are, however, also largely manufactured in America, but as a rule about an ounce heavier per 54-inch yard than this class. The English wages of a weaver in woolen mills, mostly girls, are from 12 shillings to 15 shillings a week—not one-half the American pay. That the weaving cost to the manufacturers is the same is due to the greater working power and quickness of the American operatives, who, no matter what their original nationality may be, soon learn to take up the quickness and sprightliness of their better-trained American associates.

"I have often been told by English manufacturers, when speaking of this phenomenon of small output, large number of hands, and similar disproportions in the two respective working worlds, that they knew it well. They say, and my informant in this line among the rest, that an English girl is satisfied if she earns 12 shillings, or, if she is clever, 15 shillings a week, and does not exert herself to go beyond that. I have found, however, exceptions to the rule, and we find in England variations of an almost unlimited number from the most progressive to the most stagnating method.

"The manufacturing cost per pound of finished goods is 33 cents in America, against 38 cents in England, 5 cents less in America; but the wool costs 38 cents more in America, in part on account of the wool duties. In other words, if we had the wool at the same cost as the English, we could produce at 64.31 cents what it costs in England 69.90 cents to produce. Our wools, of course sell at as much higher rates over foreign wools as the duty and charges amount to. The cheaper the foreign wools the greater the disproportion between our price and the foreign wool price. The wools used in England, cheap colonial clothing wool, though very short, are admirably adapted to that class of goods. They give a much handsomer face and add a luster and life which ours seldom show. Most of them are even of smaller shrinkage than ours of corresponding nature. Some of them, however, as the wools used by the manufacture C, are absolutely prohibited.

"There the wool costs 11 cents in the grease, but the manufacturer importing the wool has to pay a fine at the custom-house of 10 cents, not alone for the wool he uses, but 10 cents for each pound of grease and dirt, which he has to import along with the wool, and is lost in the scouring; consequently 4 pounds of wool, as in Exhibit C, are required to produce 1 pound of cloth 4 by 10, or 40 cents on 43.6 cents' worth of wool. (A wool of this sort would cost the American manufacturer fully 11½ cents more per pound of greasy wool, as not alone the duty but also the extra freight and charges, brokerage commissions, etc., have to be counted, so that the 44 cents in the 4 pounds required for a pound of cloth would cost him 90 cents, or 105 per cent., more than the English manufacturer has to pay.) Our custom-house statistics only show the rates paid on what is imported and never on what is excluded by prohibitive duties. The excluded materials are those which make the success or failure of manufacturing. The excluded materials, on the contrary, however, always find a way into the United States in the form of manufactured goods.

"The dyeing is done in America in most mills by the manufacturers; in England, by separate dye-houses. In America large quantities of similar goods, and frequently of one color, are dyed in a day's work; in England large and small quantities of dissimilar goods are lent to the dye-house from a large number of firms. A large woolen mill in Massachusetts dyeing in the wool only, gave me as the daily average quantity of indigo-blue dyeing 6,500 to 7,000 pounds of wool. For this they employ from forty-five to fifty men at $1.15 a day. Taking fifty, the larger number, they would pay $57.50, and with the head dyer, say, in round numbers, $60 a day. These men, however, do the scouring likewise of the same quantity of wool. The dyeing and scouring therefore costs in labor only six-sevenths of a cent per pound. The mill is known for paying smaller wages than is general. On the other hand, this statement shows how much saving can be effected when operations are conducted on so large a scale as in this mill and with no changes in the dye, etc.

"Whatever the causes, whatever the advantages or disadvantages in regard to the ultimate result in the character, quality, or appearance of the goods, one thing is certain, that so far as the cheapening of price is concerned our manufacturing system seems to have the honors. I only allude to this phase now inferentially. I reserve to myself the task in summing up the result of my inquiries into the manufacturing cost and working methods of different nations, to return to and more fully treat this very important subject in the economy of production. My present aim only is to report the facts." T. B. K.—Correspondence Journal Commerce.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have felt that a fair and equitable revision of the customs laws was essential. I wanted such changes as would be just to all portions of our people. By this method the inequalities could be corrected. I waited with considerable patience for the appearance of the bill so long under discussion. A perusal was disappointing. I do not term it a sectional bill. But as I look it over I find it knows no North, no East, no West; it is all South. The industries of my State are assailed quite completely. The wool-growers look upon the presentation of this measure as the harbinger of ruin. The farmers of the North, as they look upon the uncertain prospects of the crops for the season and realize the depressed condition of the sheep husbandry, feel that their great industry, which they have for years labored to create and foster, is about to be stricken down. The growers of wool will, if this bill become a law, see their flocks increase and look on as men who count a loss. Careful estimates show that the clip of wool in the United States amounts to nearly 3,000,000 pounds yearly, valued at $79,000,000, the product of forty-five million sheep.

It is computed that the placing of wool on the free-list would seriously injure eight hundred and fifty thousand men now interested in this industry. Those engaged in this occupation, employers and those dependent upon them, represent one-fifteenth of the nation's population. You will, by the enactment of this law, inflict great damage upon them and not benefit any of our people, for the removal of the protective duty will not reduce the price of the commodities made from wool, as those articles are already about as low as in any other country. As has been shown, this bill discriminates against the farmer and the poor man, the rate of duty being higher on the blanket which will be selected by the poor man than on that which will add to the comfort of his wealthy neighbor. Some gentlemen here, whose opinions I respect, tell us free wool will enhance the price to the farmer. I am not thoroughly versed in the science of economics possessed by the friends of this bill, who allege that its enactment will result in giving a higher price for wool to the farmer and a lower price to the manufacturer. If this doubtful problem could be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the friends and representatives of the farmer and wool-grower, this section would have a unanimous vote in this House. By the terms of this bill you remove protection from the producer of wool, but maintain it for the benefit of the manufacturer—the manufacturer who is so often denounced by the advocates of this bill, and whom you have sought to prove does not need protection.

For centuries the governments of the Old World have encouraged the wool-growers. The statutes of England, from 1275 to 1846, contain various enactments encouraging the growth of wool. In 1463 the importation of woolen cloth was prohibited, and in 1678, in the reign of Charles II, all persons deceased were obliged to be buried in woolens; if this were not done the person directing the burial was compelled to forfeit £5 to the Crown, or $25 in our money to-day. As late as 1715 the Government of England aided in inducing the production of wool and manufacture thereof; in 1750 the English Parliament prohibited the export of any tools or utensils for woolen manufactures, in order to check the wool product of the American colonies. That nation has built up its sheep and woolen industries by tariffs. She has given us a good example to follow. The protective policy of the United States made this a great wool-growing land. In twenty years, under protection, the sheep in this country increased from 22,000,000 to over 50,000,000, and the raw wool from 100,000,000 pounds to over 300,000,000 pounds annually. Had the industry been let alone, in a few years we should have been independent on the wool supply.

In 1883 Congress unwisely reduced the wool tariff, and the disaster to that industry began. In the short period of three years the flocks decreased 5,867,312, and there was a reduction of the wool clip of 43,000,000 pounds. Think of the great loss—millions of dollars taken away from the farmer and wool-grower and given to the inhabitants of other countries, when the money should have been kept at home. Last year the number of sheep in America was reduced 1,214,559 in number, the value of which was over $2,000,000—this sum lost in a single year. Look at Michigan and her wool-growers. It has been said that the number of sheep diminished in Michigan under high tariff and increased under low tariff. This error should have been corrected before. The census shows that in 1870 there were 1,984,964 sheep in Michigan; in 1884 the number had increased to 2,434,967. Three years after, under the reduction of duty, the number had fallen to 2,184,491. These returns show an increase of 450,000 in Michigan under the tariff of 1867, and a decrease of 250,576 under the operations of the lower duties by the act of 1883.

Last year Michigan produced 13,734,526 pounds of wool from 2,113,000 sheep, and now it is proposed to still further injure the farmers and wool-growers by sweeping away what little protection there is left them. No one has asked to have wool placed on the free-list, while thousands from my own and nearly all the other Congressional districts have appealed for their rights. You have not even read or heeded their petition for redress of a great threatened grievance. You of the majority, if you pass this bill, injure an industry of nearly every county in the Union. The people will hold you accountable for the destruction of a great division of farming pursuits. The wool-growers and farming community protest against this invasion of their rights. They realize that wool-growing is one of their main products, being exceeded in value by only eight industries in this country. The raising of wool is worth quite $100,000,000 a year to the agricultural population, while the woolen manufactures aggregate $300,000,000 per annum. Added to these there is an investment by farmers and wool-growers of $400,000,000 in sheep, barns, sheds, and other necessaries to properly care for the animals.

It is estimated that there are 467,452,499 sheep in the various countries of the world. Of the owners of the millions just spoken of the United States of America stands fourth among the possessors of sheep, having over 45,000,000 of the wool-bearing animals. The wool product of the United States is more than one-sixth of that of the wool-growing countries of the world. Do you wonder that the wool-growers desire to protect their interests? They feel the legislation contemplated in this measure will be a most serious menace to their rights and interests; that its passage will paralyze a stupendous industry and inflict great wrong and irreparable injury. Let this bill become a law and you will see exemplified the old saying, "Great cry and little wool;" the owners of sheep will cry out in a manner that will be heard, for this measure will give them little wool. The sheep-growers and farmers have suffered much of late years from unwise, unjust, and uncalled-for legislation; now it is proposed to complete the destructive work. The keeping of sheep ordinarily serves to make grain-growing profitable, for, as the Spanish proverb says, "The foot of the sheep is shod with gold;" but now wool is so low that the profit is infinitesimal. I have quoted the Spanish proverb; the Spanish wool-growers always see to it that they are protected.

The reduction of the duty on wool has, since 1883, added greatly to the importations, the receipts from duties on wool in four years were nearly $22,000,000, the aggregate increase following the reduction being $6,000,000. The lowering of duties added to the surplus, and injured the wool-grower, while failing to lessen the cost of woolen goods. The manufactures of wool imported fell off a little after the reduction, but last year the importations were larger than in 1883.

It is in the power of Congress to restore this industry to prosperity. Re-enact the duties levied in 1867 and you will at once see a great revival in the growing of wool. If this country should prohibit the importation of waste, shoddy cloth, or clothing made from that stuff, and, if possible, prevent the manufacture of shoddy, it would promote health, aid prosperity, and in a few years the United States could supply all its people with woolens at very low prices.

THE CLASS OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the governmental receipts from imports amounted to $217,225,163; of this sum over four-fifths, or $176,802,933.48, came from ten classes of articles. The ten alluded to are as follows:

Sugar	$58,016,684.34
Wool, and manufactures of	35,629,534.13
Iron and steel, manufactures of	20,713,233.89
Silk, and manufactures of	15,540,300.70
Cotton manufactures	11,710,719.88
Flax, hemp, jute, etc	9,497,981.74
Tobacco	9,127,758.26
Wines and liquors	7,402,242.82
Chemicals, drugs, etc	4,654,165.24
Glass and glassware	4,510,312.48
Total	176,802,933.48

After these ten classes have paid the sum above, the remaining fifth is collected from hundreds of other articles.

THE FREE-LIST UNDER LOW TARIFF AND THE PRESENT TARIFF.

Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1854 the number of classes of articles dutiable numbered three hundred and thirty, while there were on the free-list but twenty-eight, the importations of the latter being valued at $25,580,000. That was under the operations of the tariff of 1846. Last year the imports of articles into this country free of duty were valued at over $233,000,000, more than $200,000,000 greater than came in free of duty in the halcyon days when the country was struggling under the tariff of 1846—an enactment approaching free trade, adopted at the time Great Britain embraced that theory.

I cite these facts to show that it has been the policy of the Republican party to enlarge the free-list, to take off duties from those articles which we can not produce here, and secure a revenue and encourage the production of such as can be manufactured in our own country.

THE PRESENT TARIFF—THE FREE-LIST.

It has been stated and restated here and everywhere else in this land that the present tariff law, an act devised by well-wishers of their country and statesmen who desired the prosperity of the nation, but whose work is denominated a "robber tariff" by members here, levies duties on over four thousand articles. A careful review of the existing law demonstrates that the number of times rates of duty are mentioned therein is exactly six hundred and fifty, while the number of articles in the official schedule for collection of duties aggregate nine hundred and ten. In this list are thirty-eight articles of cotton manufacture, one hundred and seventy-two of iron and steel, twenty-two kinds of liquors, thirty-two enumerations of lumber and manufactures thereof, seventy-three grades of wool and its product, thirty-five gradations in sugar, twenty-four qualities of tobacco, and so on. It requires, however, a mathematical mind to sum up forty hundred articles dutiable. To do so requires revision reform arithmetic.

In looking at the free-list I found four hundred and twenty-five classes of articles in the present law.

A few evenings since, after listening, as is my custom, to the debate on this question during the day's session, I glanced at the list of articles admitted free of duty under the tariff law, and concluding to adopt the reform arithmetic for the time, I went rather hastily down the columns of the free-list, and I found in my hasty enumeration that there were some nine hundred and seventy-eight articles imported on which there is no tariff, tax, or duty. I flattered myself that this was an achievement and a contribution to economic knowledge. The next morning I was perusing a pamphlet on the great question of the hour, and soon learned from its pages that the tariff law of the United States of America, enacted under Republican auspices, admitted two thousand articles free of duty. I shall not enumerate the different articles of the classifications hereafter.

MAKE NECESSITIES FREE.

To enlarge the free-list and admit products that can not be advantageously raised here is excellent doctrine and worthy of emulation. Under Republican control tea and coffee were admitted free of duty, and that doctrine can be made sweeter yet by the addition of sugar to the list under the heading "free of duty." Then attach to them another article of food, rice. You know Republican policy in 1872 caused anthracite coal to be admitted free of duty. Under the operation of the existing tariff act, during the last fiscal year the worth of the imports subject to duty was $450,325,322, while the importations paying no duty amounted to over half of the value of those subject to duty, or $233,093,651. During the last fiscal year the United States received customs duties to the amount of $217,225,163, from 910 articles. The nation standing next to this in commercial greatness is England. Last year the Government of Great Britain exacted $98,611,510 in duties on 19 different products and their subdivisions. In this sum not a farthing came from impost on sugar.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO THE SUGAR CULTIVATION.

I know gentlemen will say that the cultivation of sugar should be encouraged in this country. I agree with them, and two years ago took the initiative in this matter. It has been a source of gratification for me to listen during this debate to gentlemen from various States who have maintained the idea I advocated here on the 20th of March, 1886. Last year we imported 2,781,257,878 pounds of sugar; the product of this country was 344,762,880 pounds; the consumption is over 3,000,000,000 pounds. The small amount produced in this country is from about 150,000 acres of land. Time has demonstrated that the tariff on this article has not increased the supply from our own country. If we pay a bounty, this will aid those in the industry now and may stimulate other sections to press forward in the sugar-producing effort. Germany, Russia, and France by this means created the greatest sugar product of the world, and Belgium, Austria, and Holland benefited their subjects and founded a new avenue of trade by encouraging the cultivation of sugar. The prize is worth the effort.

GOOD MEASURES OF RELIEF.

If we take sugar, which paid over $58,000,000 last year in import duties (and over $3,000,000 export duty to other countries), and rice, which yielded not quite a million dollars into the Treasury on imports, and put them on the free-list, we will have reduced the revenue $59,000,000 and given us a free-list every way admirable and beneficial. Then, if you want to help the country more yet, reduce postage to 1 cent per ounce, thereby saving the people $26,000,000 more each year and keeping the money among the people instead of distressing so many of our inhabitants by accumulating in the Treasury. Then reduce the present exorbitant postage of 16 cents per pound on seeds, plants, bulbs, and cions to 4 cents. This measure we owe to the farmers. They do not enjoy any of the great benefits of the postal system in free deliveries and numerous mails, but instead pay high for the support of the postal department and have few of its advantages. This will be simple justice to the agricultural community. You can, by appropriate legislation on these three items, at once stop the flow of money into the nation's hands, leaving it among our citizens, and the reduction by this method of $85,000,000 per year will revise the tariff satisfactorily, save the people millions of dollars, and do away with the perils surrounding the plethora in the vaults of the United States. Try this method, end this debate, and give the country rest.

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

Our laws relating to customs revenue are denominated by the present Executive, who has taken an oath to enforce them, as "vicious, inequitable, and illogical." This statute of the United States is thus described by the President of the United States. In rebuttal of this Executive utterance I summon Germany's great ruler, Prince Bismarck, the statesman whose genius created a mighty empire from discordant principalities. May 14, 1879, Bismarck declared that the prosperity of the United States was mainly due to the system of protective laws, and he successfully urged that Germany imitate our example. The governments of the world are adopting the system here. In but five nations now is there any leaning toward free trade—England, Turkey, Norway, Austria-Hungary, and Holland. Germany finds the protective policy restoring her prosperity. She realizes the profound truth of the declaration of her great economist, Frederick List, who passed from earth in 1846, but before his end impressed upon his countrymen the maxim that should be cherished by every people, "that the markets of the nation should be reserved to the labor of the nation."

THE PROSPERITY OF THE NATION.

The United States of America now stands in the front rank of the nations of the world—leads them all; the aggregate of its industries are larger than that of any other people. Mulhall, acknowledged to be the most eminent of all statisticians, in his Dictionary of Statistics, places the industries of the United States at $11,405,000,000 per annum, which is $2,205,000,000 greater than those of the United Kingdom of Great Britain; nearly double those of France; almost twice as large as those of Germany; nearly three times as large as those of Russia, and very nearly equal to the combined industries of Austria, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Australia, Canada, and Sweden and Norway. These figures photograph the mightiness of this nation, and fix its rank in the industrial world. This eminent, proud, and prosperous place in the nations of the universe has been mostly created under the protective policy—a policy which should remain undisturbed, and the Republic and its people permitted to continue the advance to greatness.

In the above estimates Mulhall places the industries of the United States at $11,405,000,000 yearly. This is regarded as a low estimate. Our economists think $14,000,000,000 would be nearer the figures. In the wealth of nations, the United States of America stands as the richest of all. Its possessions increase $875,000,000 each year, while France adds to its wealth $375,000,000 per annum, Great Britain $325,000,000, Germany $200,000,000. Our customs laws do not prevent the growth of wealth, intelligence, and happiness, but on the contrary promote these great blessings.

"THE MARKETS OF THE WORLD."

We are told that if we remove and reduce our tariff we will enjoy the markets of the world. If we were to sweep away every custom-house to-day, expunge every law from our statutes that levies a tariff, and make the country absolutely free-trade, does any one think that any nation or people would buy more of us than they wanted? No. You would find that we had not increased our trade with other nations. The effect would be to break down our industries and help those of other countries. The manufacturing nations want to sell, not to buy. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, we bought of Mexico, the Central American States, British Honduras, and the twenty governments of the West Indies and South America products to the value of $172,468,526—over one-fourth of all our purchases from the outside world. In return, how much did we sell to them of our products and manufactures? Only $64,904,479 worth—a little over one-third as much as we bought of them. It can not be said that our tariff prevented them from buying from our people, for over one-half of the articles we bought of them were admitted free of duty. I append a table I have prepared, giving the imports from the countries named, our exports to, and the value of goods brought here free of duty, which is as follows:

Countries.	Imports from.	Exports to.	Imports free of duty.

Gentlemen, "the markets of the world" will not come to us. We must rely upon the best market in the world, the home market, the market created by the people of our land—I repeat, the best market of the world. Let us do nothing to destroy that. Rather, when you talk your theories, remember that true saying of the great apostle of free trade, Adam Smith, who, in his Wealth of Nations, makes this admission, which you all overlook:

Whatever tends to diminish in any country the number of artificers and manufacturers tends to diminish the home market, the most important of all markets, for the rude produce of the land, and thereby still further to discourage agriculture.

Equally applicable is the observation of Alexander Hamilton, who regarded "an extensive domestic market for the surplus of the soil" as of the highest importance. He held the domestic market—is of all things that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. To secure such a market there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class after the cultivators of the land, are, for that reason, the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor.

WILL REDUCED DUTIES REDUCE THE SURPLUS?

There are but one or two governments in the world whose receipts exceed expenses. The United States of America is one of the fortunate nations. We are troubled with too much money, while nearly all other governments are in difficulties from deficiencies. We are embarrassed by riches. A surplus is easier to manage than a deficiency. The advocates of the bill now before us desire to reduce the revenue by reduction of duties. Will the bill accomplish the end desired? The first revenue reformer we read of was Jean Baptiste Colbert, minister of finance of France under Louis XIV, in 1661. France needed money; its exchequer was frightfully depleted and its obligations could not be met. Colbert stated he could replenish the treasury by reduction of duties. He was laughed at, but tried the experiment. The duties were reduced 33 per cent. For a time the receipts of the government fell off; this was followed by largely increased importations, largely augmented receipts from customs, and the revenue rapidly swelled, while the industries of the country languished and the people suffered for employment. The experiment was abandoned after a time.

MICHIGAN—A GRAND STATE AND ITS PROSPERITY.

Turning from the figures above, which denote the grandeur of our country, I look now with pardonable pride upon the strides Michigan has made—the grand peninsular State which is taking its leading place in the front rank of the blessed union of States. We find by the State census of 1884 much that is cheering. In 1880 the number of its farms was 154,008, and the acreage in the same 13,807,240. In four years the farms had increased to 159,605 and the acreage to 14,852,226; in 1880 it had 8,296,862 acres of improved farm lands; in four years the same had risen to 8,974,156, showing an average annual increase of 169,448 acres in improved farms, 88 per cent. being cultivated by their owners. In 1880 the farms, including lands, fences, and buildings, were valued at $490,103,181; four years later their value had increased to $571,443,462, and in the same period the value of the farming implements had increased nearly two and a half million dollars and the live-stock on these farms reached the value of $70,626,648, an increase of $15,000,000 in the space of four years. In 1883 the Michigan farmers paid $13,532,675 in wages to farm hands.

These figures eloquently demonstrate the prosperity of the agricultural classes from 1880 to 1884. At the beginning of the present decade there was $92,930,959 invested in manufacturing. In four years this had grown to $136,697,397, an increase of almost 50 per cent. from 1880 to 1884. In 1880 the manufacturers of Michigan gave employment to 77,535 persons, and four years after the industries required 127,007 workmen, an increase of 50,000 wage-earners in forty-eight months. The wages paid in 1880 were $25,313,682, which ran up to $44,213,739 in 1884, an increase of nearly 80 per cent. The material used in 2,228 (or more than one-fourth) of the manufacturing establishments of the State is taken directly from the forest tree, requiring $62,303,000 capital and employing 53,297 persons, who were paid $17,310,227 in wages in 1884. These are genuine home industries with the raw material right at hand. The mines of Michigan employed 13,193 workmen in 1884, paying them $6,286,355 in wages. These mines required a capital of $41,441,962. In the Michigan fisheries 1,338 fishermen in 1884 earned $253,683, and these 316 fisheries had a capital of $702,365.

In concluding this gratifying reference to the glorious State which I have the honor in part to represent, I desire to say that Michigan has prospered in the past and is prospering now. The agitation of the tariff has injured that Commonwealth some, as it has all portions of our land. This agitation is a disturber of prosperity, and only unsettles and injures the welfare of all classes. This will in a few months come to an end. Let me state that the value of the farms of Michigan have increased $81,000,000 in eight years, and the personal property on these farms in the same period was augmented to the amount of $17,000,000. Here we have $98,000,000 of wealth added to the possessions of the farming community in the short period of eight years. Then the addition to the manufacturing capital of the State in the same period was $44,000,000. The actual wealth of Michigan in 1880 was given by the census at $1,370,000,000. Its progress has been so great that now its wealth is estimated by the best of authority to have reached the colossal figures of $2,000,000,000, an increase of $630,000,000 in eight years. So long as the tariff affords such magnificent results of greatness and prosperity, so long will we maintain the system, thereby promoting the progress of all our people.

FARM MORTGAGES.

Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen on this floor have dwelt with "ghoulish glee" upon the fact that many farms in this country are encumbered with mortgages. Some orators have enlarged upon the subject with such extravagance that they demonstrated the farm mortgages nearly exceed the value of the property, which, were their statements true, would indicate we have in this land very liberal money-lenders. Then the orators aforesaid demonstrate to their satisfaction that these mortgages are due to our tariff laws. Were there no mortgages in this country when we by law approximated free trade? Indeed there were, and in those days of trouble and hard times foreclosures were terribly frequent. Michigan, with the mortgages in that State, has been quoted. I find by the census of Michigan that the assessed valuation of its farms was $335,378,025; on which farms there were mortgages aggregating $64,392,580, an incumbrance of less than 20 per cent., not on the actual value, but on the assessed value. And the friends of this measure pending propose to diminish the opportunities for payment by inaugurating hard times. If the mortgages in this country are occasioned by the tariff, does free trade make such evidences of indebtedness impossible? Let us see: Mulhall tells us that the mortgages on the farms of England are 58 per cent. of their total value.

Sir Edward Sullivan, member of parliament, of England, relates the gloomy fact that—

Since 1876 the value of lands and the income from farms in England have fallen from 30 to 50 per cent., but the interest on the mortgages remains the same.

Lord Derby states the losses of English land owners have been $1,500,000,000, and the losses of tenants $600,000,000. He furthermore says that hundreds of thousands of acres have gone out of cultivation in ten years. During the last session of Parliament, Hon. Henry Champlin, in his speech, with sorrow alluded to the great falling off in tilled lands, the decrease of cattle and sheep, and of 700,000 persons idle from the paralysis of English agriculture. From this gloomy picture of the land of free trade we turn, determined not to permit the hands of national progress to be turned back, but instead to keep in mind the homely but safe maxim, "Let well enough alone."

But let us go back to the subject of mortgages in Michigan, for the whole has not yet been told; one phase of the subject has been overlooked or forgotten. There are in Michigan about 25,000 farmers who came from foreign climes, most of them from lands where free trade is the law. They left their native places solely with the purpose of bettering their condition, inspired with the hope and desire of owning the soil they were to till, believing that under our laws all true wealth comes from the kind earth. They are frugal, industrious citizens; they brought to the State their savings, and the 25,000 added to our wealth $4,663,188. This money they invested in Michigan farm lands, borrowing $11,191,714, making a total investment of $15,824,902. To-day their farms are worth at a low valuation $65,000,000. These adopted citizens have added $50,000,000 to their own possessions, augmenting the wealth of the Commonwealth that sum, all from an investment of less than $16,000,000, three-fourths of which was originally in mortgages. Let me add, in concluding this reference to farm mortgages in Michigan, that the report from which I quote states that during the last fiscal year but 1,667 mortgages were foreclosed for non-payment, and part of the lands sold were redeemed.

"THE GOVERNMENT ECONOMICALLY ADMINISTERED."

It is germane to the subject being discussed to speak of the administration of the Government. There is a familiar reform phrase relating to the Government economically administered. We remember four years ago the country heard from the press and the hustings many marvelous tales about the extravagance of the party then in power. Have the expenses of the nation been reduced since then? If so, when and where? The appropriations for the fiscal year 1885, regular, annual, and permanent, were $302,179,381.73; those for 1886, the first year of the present era of reform, ran up to $330,645,507.87, an increase of $28,466,126.14; those for 1887 were $355,357,584.58, an increase of $24,712,076.71; those for 1888 were $360,357,524.83, an increase of $4,999,940.25. The estimates furnished by the Departments for the coming fiscal year figure up $384,094,527.58. Granting that this amount will be appropriated, which is quite probable, as the sum will likely be larger, the amount will be $23,737,002.75 greater than for the preceding year, making, in round numbers, $82,000,000 increase in appropriations for carrying on "the Government, economically administered," in four years. Added to this we find the appropriations for deficiencies for 1886 to have been $13,866,719.62, and at this session $14,101,400.74, making a total of $27,968,120.36.

These deficiency appropriations, added to the four regular annual and permanent appropriations for the four years of the present Administration, will make an increase of $109,883,266.21 in conducting national affairs when the Government is economically administered. These excessive appropriations can not be attributed to Congress, for I find that the Department estimates were reduced as follows: For 1886, $44,539,706.62; for 1887, $31,775,220.40; for 1888, $15,549,065.46—a total reduction by Congress in three years of $91,853,992.48 from the estimates of the heads of the different Departments who are economically administering the Government.

To make the figures more readily understood, they are tabulated below:

Increase in appropriations for fiscal year—
1886	$28,465,126.14
1887	24,712,076.71
1888	4,999,940.25
1889 (estimated)	23,737,002.75
Deficiency appropriations for the fiscal year—
1886	13,866,719.62
	109,883,266.21

It should be remembered that another deficiency bill is to come in this session which will swell the amount over three millions more.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, it was frequently stated four years ago that the Government under Republican control was extravagantly administered, and several of you gentlemen piously and frequently invoked the people to "turn the rascals out." The people alliteratively ordered a change. But they have repented of their ill-considered acts. I do not charge there is extravagance now. If these expenditures are necessary, then the Republican administrations were economical. If there be waste, reform is necessary. The money of the people should not be wasted. The most honest and intelligent of Napoleon's brothers once said, "Gold in its last analysis is the sweat and blood of nations." Every dollar wasted by this Government by unworthy and unnecessary objects represents so much of the life-blood of the people. In eight months full inquiry will be made as to the actual condition of affairs. At that time we hope to "open the books."

INCREASE OF OFFICE-HOLDERS.

There is another matter which attracted much attention in the political contest of four years ago. The orators of the party now in power dwelt long and vociferously over the appalling fact that 100,000 office-holders were running the country, and pointed out the dangers to the nation from this class. The present Executive, then as now a candidate, was uneasy over this force of servants of the public, and alluded to the mischief they were capable of performing. So impressed was he over the situation that confronted him that he wanted a constitutional amendment to prevent him, in case of his success, utilizing the office-holding army. The country in 1884 was promised that the office-holding class under the Government should be reduced in number. Has this reform been accomplished? Nay, nay. Wonderful to tell, the office-holding brigades of the nation have been recruited, and now, with enlarged ranks, are eager for the fray.

If you will examine Senate Report No. 507, made by Senator COCKRELL, of Missouri, on page 3 of that document, you will find that the total array of "officers and employés in the several branches of the civil service" reaches the startling number of 132,072! If this species of reform continues, ere another four years goes by the office-holding forces of this Republic will become a vaguely defined host, which, like Israel of old, it is forbidden any man to number. And, Mr. Chairman, I grieve to say that this army of placemen can only be truthfully described in the language of the present Executive as "a horde of office-holders with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favor yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service" the reform ticket nominated at St. Louis. Here are 132,072 officials of the nation. Is it any wonder the Executive trembled when the force was an even 100,000? And yet the addition of 32,072 will not change his ideas of civil-service reform, or that of the party with which he is identified, including the "horde" spoken of by the President.

TRUSTS.

We have been told in eloquent language of the existence of twenty-seven trusts in this country. Trusts are infamous conspiracies against the rights of the people. Where is the remedy to protect the public against the encroachments of the oppressor, and why is it not applied by the legislative power? The trust claims that it is for the benefit of the people. The trust must go. Among others the great combine, composed of 132,072 of our people, headed by the highest official power in the land, must go. It terms itself "a public office is a public trust," and the thousands of office-holders rally around to perpetuate it. George William Curtis terms it a conspiracy against human rights. This trust, alleged to be for the benefit of the people, has had its day and will in a few months be relegated to the limbo of broken trusts. It is a singular fact that four years ago the trust was almost unknown. But one existed; it was the Standard Oil trust, and it aided in the overthrow of the party then in power and paved the way for the advent of reform. Since then twenty-six new trusts have grown up and flourished in this country.

THE PEOPLE'S RIGHTS.

The tariff we believe promotes the prosperity of the people. This tariff enabled the nation to carry on its war for existence; it permits a grateful country to care for its defenders; it affords the opportunity for the Government to deal justly with its soldiers and those who are dependent upon them. This justice is wrongfully delayed. For this delay there is no reason in law, right, or justice. Under the operations of our customs laws wages are higher in this country than in any other. For proof of this statement see Democratic platform of 1884, reaffirmed in 1888. The comforts and necessities of life are as cheap here and often cheaper than in other lands. Why, had it not been for this tariff the prices of everything, including the red bandana, would be much higher than now, as they were before our industries felt its stimulating effect on production and competition. Speaking of the red bandana, the alleged oriflamme of victory for the Administration, let me call your attention to prophecy which shall see fulfillment. If you will open your Bible, as you should, you will find in Ezekiel, xiii, 21: "Your kerchiefs also will I tear, and deliver my people out of your hands.' As you study these prophetic words, recall to your mind that the earth and the fullness thereof was promised to the seed of Jacob, and then remember that two of Jacob's sons were Benjamin and Levi. [Applause.]

In the name of the public weal do not turn back the hands of national progress, but let this agitation cease and permit the country to continue "the policy which inspires labor with hope and crowns it with dignity." [Applause.]

Mr. MCKINNEY. I am glad the gentleman who has just taken his seat has such faith in the old prophecies; and if those prophecies are to be fulfilled in the destruction of the bandana and the party it represents, the only thing we can do who are resting under the promise of that destruction is to show the faith that is in us and die like men.

Mr. O'DONNELL. You will do it, too.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I have no desire to make a lengthy speech on this occasion. I only wish to offer a few remarks in answer to the first gentleman who took the floor this morning, Mr. PUGSLEY, of Ohio. He told us in the very beginning of his remarks that it was absolutely necessary that the farmers in his Ohio district, especially on the poor lands, should maintain a flock of sheep because of their value as fertilizers.

Now, it seems to me that this argument of the gentleman is a very proper one, and one, too, that does not argue in favor of a protective tariff on wool. In the speech which I made on the tariff in the month of May I stated it was impossible for the State of Ohio and other States in the North to compete with the Southern and Southwestern States and Territories, because of the value of the land in Ohio as compared with the value of land in those Southern climates. But it is a fact well known to every one who has had experience in sheep-raising—and I am glad that in my early days that was my business in the State of Ohio, in a county that produces more wool than any other county in that State and the very best quality of wool—it is well-known, I say, to every one who has had any experience in wool-growing that there is no stock raised upon a farm that is so valuable as a fertilizer as sheep.

Take a poor farm in the State of Ohio that will produce but lightly of wheat, of corn, of oats, or of other vegetables and pasture your sheep upon the fields and they will enrich it, and enrich it at a less cost than it can be enriched in any other possible way. Now, I say that though there were not a pound of wool grown upon a sheep's back the farmer who dwells upon the poor lands of the district our friend from Ohio represents could afford to raise sheep upon his farm for mutton and fertilizer alone. The gentleman has very plainly shown to the House and to the country that the farmer in his district has three profits from his sheep: first, from the wool that is grown; second, from the mutton; and third, in the fertilizing qualities which result in the production of better crops. Why, I ask you, in the face of these facts, when they become a necessity to the farmer, backed by the statement of this gentleman, should this House be asked to place a high protective tariff upon wool in order that the farmer in Ohio may have a better profit, although he has three profits from his sheep already?

I want to know if the gentleman would argue upon this floor or to the country that there would be less fertilization from a sheep under free-trade than there would be under a protective tariff? It is my impression that the sheep would know nothing whatever about it, but would go on fertilizing the fields under free-trade just as they do under the protective tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. There might be a decrease in their number, though.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Well, as the gentleman raises that question, we will see about the effect of the protective tariff upon the increase or the decrease of the sheep in Ohio. In 1866, the year before the high protective tariff on wool went into effect, if I remember aright, there were in Ohio no less than 6,568,000 sheep.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MCKINNEY was allowed to continue his remarks for five minutes longer.

Mr. MCKINNEY. From 1866 to 1877, eleven years of protection, the number of sheep in Ohio was reduced to 3,900,000, showing a decrease of 2,600,000. Now, some of our Ohio brethren say that this was because they found themselves——

Mr. WILKINS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McKINNEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILKINS. Where did you get your statistics?

Mr. McKINNEY. I get my statistics from the Government statistical reports.

Mr. WILKINS. Statistics showing that there were over 6,000,000 sheep in Ohio in 1866?

Mr. McKINNEY. In 1866 you had 6,568,000 sheep, and in 1877 you had only 3,900,000.

Mr. WILKINS. Is the publication to which the gentleman is referring an official document? If so, I will ask him to give me the number of it.

Mr. McKINNEY. I will give it to you when I get through. In 1883 you had 5,500,541. From 1877 to 1883 you had made an increase, but still you had more than a million and a half less sheep than you had in 1866.

In the State of New York in 1866 there were 5,117,000 sheep. In 1882 there were 1,732,000. In 1887 there were 1,879,000. These figures show very plainly that sheep were not increased in number in the States I have named during the period of the high protective tariff.

In the early part of the debate upon this bill we had an address delivered here upon the subject of wool by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], in which he showed us a blanket and made a statement——

Mr. GROSVENOR. As the gentleman has been going into figures, I would like to call his attention to the fact that in 1866 there were about two millions and a half of people, counting every man, woman, and child in the State of Ohio. Now, does the gentleman suppose it possible that there were more than two sheep to every individual of the entire population, city and country?

Mr. McKINNEY. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking another. How many people have you now in Ohio?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Only three and a quarter millions.

Mr. McKINNEY. How many sheep have you in Ohio now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know the exact number, but nothing like the number you have stated. Your figures are totally wrong.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. His figures are too low.

Mr. LANHAM. According to the report of Mr. Dodge, the statistician, it is estimated that in January, 1888, there were 4,106,622 in the State of Ohio.

Mr. McKINNEY. If the gentleman from Ohio will go to the statistics, he will find that in 1887 there were 5,000,000.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The agricultural report of the State of Ohio gives the number of sheep in that State in 1867 as 7,555,507.

Mr. McKINNEY. I am giving the figures taken from the statistical returns, and if the statistics are wrong the gentleman [Mr. GROSVENOR] will have an opportunity to prove that fact later. I am not giving figures as of my own knowledge. I am not here to deceive this House or to deceive the people of this country. I am here only to state facts, and when I go to the official returns of this Government for my figures I assume that they are correct, but if they are not correct the gentleman will have ample opportunity to show their incorrectness hereafter.

During the early part of this debate the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] made a speech on this floor in which he referred to this wool question, and produced a blanket which was manufactured, as I understood, in the State of Iowa. In doing so that gentleman made the proposition that if the Mills bill should become a law it would not only destroy the wool interest of the State of Iowa, but would shut down the mill at which this blanket had been produced. This statement was received with great enthusiasm by the gentleman's colleagues on this floor. Now, that speech went to the State of Iowa, and was read by the gentleman who owns the mill where that blanket was made. In order to show the manufacturer's idea of the argument of the gentleman from Iowa, I send to the desk a letter which the proprietor of that mill addressed to a certain newspaper on that subject. I ask the Clerk to read this letter for the information of the House, as well as of the gentleman from Iowa himself, who, I hope, will give especial attention to the reading.

BONAPARTE, IOWA, May 21, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 19th instant I would say: Our woolen factory commenced operations in 1854, and was in full blast in 1856, and we have been running continuously since that time, except July, 1863, to March, 1864, at which time, having been burned out, we were rebuilding our factory. We have run continuously since then, except stops in the winter for repairs.

The volume of our business is larger than before the war, because we have a great deal more machinery and better facilities for manufacturing. Taking, however, the amount of machinery we had before the war and our facilities for conducting the business, we had proportionately as large if not a larger amount of business then, and I know with more profit to us. Our business was much more profitable before the war than now.

If the Mills bill passes with its provisions for the reduction of the wool tariff, it is my opinion it would not reduce the volume of our business, but have a tendency to increase it. It would if passed increase our profits, and consequently our ability to increase wages of operatives. In our experience, however, the question of wages is regulated by the law of supply and demand wholly, and not affected by the tariff.

In my opinion the number of sheep has largely decreased in Van Buren County since 1860. I am a sheep-breeder, and while the sheep industry, taken for a succession of years, is always a profitable business, the profit before the tariff was put on the wool was as great and some years greater than now.

With reference to wages paid before the war and now, I have forgotten, and am unable to answer. I find with reference to my books that we paid our boss-carder in 1865 the same wages that I do now.

Yours truly,

ISAIAH MEEK.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman who flaunted that blanket in the faces of the members of this House, saying that the Mills bill would not only ruin the wool-growers, but would also shut down the mill where that blanket was produced, is sufficiently answered by this letter from the owner of the mill, who is very confident that by the passage of the Mills bill the amount of his manufactures and his profits will be increased. I am as willing to accept his statement on this subject as that of the gentleman from Iowa, who I presume knows not so much in regard to the question of manufacturing.

One word further and I am done. It is agued on this floor that if the Mills bill goes into effect and wool is put upon the free-list, the price of wool in this country will be reduced to such an extent that it will be impossible for our farmers to continue the raising of sheep for the purpose of wool production. Sir, I am honest in the statement of my belief that if wool were placed on the free-list to-day, it would not sell for one cent a pound less in this country when the next clip comes into market than it did the present year when the last clip came in. It is well known that this country produces to-day but 265,000,000 pounds of wool.

A MEMBER. How are the people to get cheaper clothing if the price of wool will not be reduced?

Mr. McKINNEY. I will answer the gentleman. It is a fact that we find it necessary to import into this country for our own consumption about 335,000,000 pounds of wool and woolen goods in various forms. This amount it is now necessary for us to purchase abroad. The only effect of making wool free will be to raise the price of wool in Europe, and to maintain the price that prevails in this country to-day. The gentleman asks how are we going to give the people cheaper clothing. The question is not with reference to the reduction of the price of wool used in the manufacture of woolen goods. The question is whether we shall in our manufacturing start upon an even basis with the manufacturer of Europe. If the price of wool in Europe should increase so as to become equal to the price in America, then whatever the price of wool may be, whether 25, 30, or 40 cents a pound, the American manufacturer would purchase his wool at precisely the same price that is paid in Europe; and there being a protection of 40 per cent. ad valorem on the manufactured goods, as provided in the Mills bill, the American manufacturer would be on an equality with the European, and by reason of the 40 per cent. protection would not be injurously affected by the competition of the foreign manufacture.

This is not a question of price, it is a question of the equality upon which the manufacturer in this country starts, as compared with the manufacturer abroad. It is a well-known fact as stated by Mr. Switzler, statistician of the Treasury Department, that if the worsted manufactories of this country in the last year had been worked to their full capacity, we would have been short 80,000,000 pounds in the wool necessary for the manufacture of worsted goods. We can not manufacture such goods as the Scotch cheviots and English broadcloths, without the importation of Scotch and English wool. The very moment that wool is put on the free-list its price in Europe will increase, so that in our manufacture of woolen goods we shall be upon the same basis with the foreign manufacturer. Hence the wool-grower will not be injured; the manufacturer will have an opportunity to increase his production; and we shall manufacture our own goods instead of importing, as we do to-day, millions of dollars' worth of goods from Europe in order to supply our home market.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to be able to call the attention of the House to any new points on this subject; I shall seek only to condense and reproduce a few facts which I think worthy of consideration. The amendment which I offered yesterday is a substantial reproduction of the tariff schedule of 1867, so far as wool is concerned.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that this country is now consuming about 400,000,000 pounds of wool annually; and the great question arises, where are we going to obtain that wool for our consumption? Shall we produce it here in our own country or shall we purchase it in foreign markets? My State is greatly interested in this question. It is a large wool-growing State, and I feel it incumbent upon me to stand here until the last moment and protest against the enactment of any law which shall destroy that industry. It is idle to say the farmers of my State or in the Northwest can continue to raise sheep if wool be placed upon the free-list. Such a law will utterly destroy sheep-raising not only in my State but in the whole country, and we shall be dependent on foreign markets for the wool we shall need for our consumption. The evil would not stop there, but it is very evident that when we cease to grow our own wool, when sheep-raising in this country is driven out and the foreign growers are in possession of our markets, there will be a large advance in the price of wool, and we shall be obliged to submit to their terms.

I notice that in 1868, just after the law of 1867, the whole number of sheep then in America was 25,000,000 head. Within sixteen years after the enactment of the law of 1867, which increased the duty, the number of sheep was increased to 50,000,000. This shows conclusively that the increased duty stimulated the production. But as soon as the reduction of duties on wool, 11 and 12 per cent. ad valorem, by the act of 1883, the number of sheep began to decline, and we suffered a loss of 6,000,000 head in the four years which followed. Is stronger evidence required to show that the duty on wool is already too low, and that it is impossible for us to compete with Australia, Russia, and South America, with their cheap labor and lands, in the production of wool? Sir, the production of wool is almost universal with us. We find sheep in every State and almost every county.

The sheep in the United States in 1887 were distributed as follows:

New England States	1,237,085
Middle States	2,968,032
Southern States	9,241,449
Western States	14,332,538
Pacific coast	9,892,652
Territories, etc	7,687,558
Total number	44,759,314

—Wool Reporter, page 164.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask for a short time longer. I will not unnecessarily consume the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CASWELL. Not to exceed ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CASWELL. In 1887 the importation of wool was 114,000,000 pounds, or about 29 per cent. of the amount of wool which was consumed by the people. Shall we now increase that importation to three hundred or four hundred million pounds? If so, we must furnish the gold to pay for it. We must relinquish the occupation, so ancient and so profitable. We shall dismiss the shepherd, whose familiar calling has adorned the pages of all history wherever civilization has existed down to the present hour. We shall no longer have use for him. This will dispose of another calling which has given so much labor to our working classes.

What is the object of placing wool on the free-list? What is the object of the passage of the bill itself? My friends on the other side of the House claim, and I will not impugn their motives, that it is to reduce the price of goods and products to the consumer. Let me say to you, whenever you cheapen the products of labor you reduce the price of labor itself, and you can not avoid it. And whenever you cheapen products you increase the purchasing power of the bonds and securities, the money, the mortgages, and the notes held throughout the country by rich people. If you cheapen products 20 per cent. you increase the purchasing power of the wealthy to the same extent. Money and securities are their capital stock, their wealth, while labor alone constitutes the capital stock of the poor. You do not increase the purchasing power of his capital, but you impair it by compelling him to submit to a reduction in the price of his wages.

But you say your legislation will enable him to purchase the goods which he needs at a less price. That may be true, but you can not claim you improve his condition; you injure him by reducing the price of his labor, or I may say his capital; while it must be said you increase the value of all mortgages, notes, and other evidences of wealth in the law you would pass. Instead of legislating in the interest of labor you inflict a blow which will put the laboring man to a great disadvantage. There is no escape from this conclusion.

Why should this great blow be given to the farmers of the country? Last year there were imported into this country $74,000,000 of farm products. If this bill should become a law it will place a large additional list of farm products upon the free-list. We may look for and confidently expect, if this bill shall pass, that next year more than $200,000,000 worth of farm products and products in which the farmer is interested will find their way into this country. Are gentlemen prepared for that state of things? Is the farmer going to sit by and not complain? Why, sir, the people are already suffering from the blow leveled at their industries by this bill. I for one am constantly receiving letters making inquiry as to the prospect of the Mills bill. Here is one I have taken from the mail within the last half hour. The inquiry is "what is the prospect of the passage of the Mills bill, and the probability of putting wool on the free-list?" Says the writer: "Buyers are holding back and are not purchasing for fear of the passage of the Mills bill."

Sir, it will be difficult to estimate the injury that has already fallen upon the people arising from the fear of the passage of this bill. The depression in the wool markets is very great. The price of wool has already greatly depreciated and the growers must sell at great loss. Pass this bill and it is a long step in the direction of free trade. If this policy is to continue it will not be long before we will find foreign nations have complete possession of the American markets instead of the people of our own country.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Chairman, this being a subject of very great importance to my district and to my State, I ask unanimous consent of the committee that I may proceed with my remarks until I get through. I think I shall not exceed thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to proceed for thirty minutes without interruption.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Mills bill, in its provisions regarding wool, strikes a deadly blow at one of the leading industries of my district and State, and of the United States. I am opposed to that bill for this, if for no other reason. I am in favor of these amendments because I would correct the blunder made by the reduction of the wool tariff in 1883. I invite attention to some statistics regarding the subject of wool, which show conclusively the great injury it would be to us should the bill pass.

Number of sheep in my district in the spring of—

1883	165,246
Decrease in four years	36,155

Wool clipped in the district:

1883	pounds...	631,971
1886 (the last year for which figures are obtainable)	do.....	569,056
Decrease in three years		62,915

This wool was worth not less than 32 cents per pound in our market in 1886; so that the loss on wool alone has been at least $20,132. The sheep were worth in 1883 at least $3.50 per head. This value has been reduced by not less than $1 per head by reason of the tariff act of 1883; so that the loss on the decreased number of sheep is not less than $36,155. The total wool clip for the years 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886 was 2,478,814 pounds. This, by reason of the tariff reduction of 1883, was sold at an average price of at least 6 cents per pound less than it would have brought under the tariff of 1867; so the loss here was $148,728, or a total loss to the district by reason of the act of 1883 of $205,015.

But this computation does not take into account the loss by decrease of the flocks since the spring of 1887, and decrease of the wool clip since the spring of 1886, for which no statistics are given. Broaden the view somewhat:

	Sheep.
We had in the State of Ohio in the spring of 1883	5,130,920
There were left in the spring of 1887	4,111,871
Or a loss in four years of	1,019,049
	Pounds.
In the spring of 1883 in Ohio we clipped of wool	24,349,109
In 1884	23,558,713
So there was loss in 1884 of	790,396
In 1885 we had	22,081,552
Or a shortage for that year of	2,267,557
In 1886 we had	19,702,329
Or a decrease for that year of	4,646,780
Being a total shortage in pounds for the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 of	7,704,733

Following the same rule of computation adopted for the district, the losses in the State have been, by reason of the tariff act of 1883, as follows:

Loss on decreased price of wool sold	$3,920,555
Loss on wool shortage	2,465,514
Loss on sheep killed or otherwise disposed of	1,019,049
Total loss to the State, not including loss on clip of 1887 nor on decrease of flocks since then	7,405,118

Or an average loss, to the 247,189 farms in the State, of $30 per farm.

The price paid for wool in 1887 in my district, and generally through the State, would average 32 cents per pound for the better grades. It will not average more than 22 cents the present year for the same grades. The reduction in price has been occasioned by the pendency and discussion of the Mills bill alone.

When the buyers went into the market this year they were compelled to buy upon the basis of wool being placed upon the free-list, or else assume the risk of losing upon the investment in case this bill should pass.

Capital does not invest in that way. The result has been that free-trade prices have been and are being paid for the Ohio wool clip of 1888, and the farmers must and do bear the loss. And no matter what the fate of the bill may ultimately be, that loss at least has fallen upon the Ohio farmers, and the farmers of my district, by reason of the mere discussion of the proposition to put wool on the free-list.

The wool clip with us is essentially the main dependence of our farmers, as a means of raising money to pay taxes and to meet debts coming due in the early part of the year. Coming, as it does, early in the summer season, it is about the only resource they have for these purposes.

It will be readily seen then with what galling force anything interfering with the expected and accustomed returns from this industry, strikes the homes of the common people of the land.

Gentlemen may air their rhetoric, and indulge in their dreams of trade supremacy, and felicitate themselves upon having taken a step—a long step—by this bill in the direction of ultimate free trade, which is the design they are secretly and covertly intending to accomplish. But we point to this condition of affairs in this one business, which has brought an absolute loss this one year to the people of Ohio of not less than $1,800,000 by reason of the mere discussion of your bill. This loss is one of its first fruits. If this appears in the green tree, what may we expect in the dry?

Mr. FITCH. If the farmers of Ohio lost 10 cents a pound of the r ice of their wool, did not the American consumer get the benefit?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I will answer that question further along in my remarks, if the gentleman will do me the favor to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is a very good place now to answer yes or no.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I think it will come in a little better somewhere further on in my remarks, as I have got some good things of my own to say.

Much discussion has been had regarding the effect of the tariff of 1867 upon the production and price of wool. I propose to show you what effect it produced in Ohio at a time when values were not dependent upon an inflated and consequently depreciated currency; at a time when the condition of the flocks, as to numbers, and the production of wool as to pounds, may be fairly attributed to the operations of that law; I desire also to show the discouraging and injurious effect produced by the tariff act of 1883 upon this industry. To do this I have selected the period running from January 1, 1879, when specie resumption was had, to the summer of 1887.

From and including the spring of 1879, to and including the spring of 1883, we have a period when it may be fairly said the natural and legitimate effects of the tariff of 1867 would be apparent as regards sheep husbandry. We have a like period from the spring of 1883 to and including the year 1887, wherein the same opportunity is given of forming a judgment regarding the operation of the act of 1883 in this particular.

I have here a table taken from official sources in Ohio to which I invite attention, and which I submit as a part of my remarks, showing the number of sheep in the State, and pounds of wool shorn, for each year from 1879 to 1887, inclusive.

Statement of number of sheep and pounds of wool shorn in Ohio from 1879 to 1887, inclusive.

1881	"Ohio Statistics," supra	4,923,174	22,651,802
1882	do	4,594,607	23,629,424
1883	do	5,130,920	24,349,109
1884	do	4,968,794	23,558,713
1885	do	4,928,332	22,081,532
1886	do	4,277,463	19,702 329
1887	do	4,111,871	(*)

*No statistics yet extant as to clip of this year.

It will be noticed by the table that from the spring of 1879 to the spring of 1883, inclusive, the number of sheep in the State increased by 863,659 head; the wool produced increased by 5,677,689 pounds, thus demonstrating the natural effect of the tariff of 1867 to have been the increase of the flocks upon the one hand and a large increase of wool on the other. And it shows also that the industry was advancing upon both of these lines when the tariff of 1883 was passed. When the tariff of 1883 was passed we had in Ohio 5,130,920 sheep; in four years that was reduced, as shown by this table, to 4,111,871, while the pounds of wool had fallen off in three years more than 4,600,000 pounds.

This clearly and conclusively shows that the act of 1883 has commenced what the Mills bill is intended to complete, namely, the absolute annihilation of sheep husbandry among our people.

I have taken this leading sheep and wool-producing State as an example of the evil effects of the tariff of 1883 upon sheep and wool raising. An examination of the question as to other wool-producing States will unquestionably show like results.

But these results could only flow from the competition with which the American farmer must contend, and which was compelled by the act of 1883.

Let us see where the danger is and what we may expect to meet if this bill shall finally become the law of the land. In order that it may be seen how much an Ohio buyer could now pay, and be safe, if the Mills bill should pass, I submit the following table, giving a comparison of the Philadelphia and London markets for such grades of wool as are commonly produced in that State, namely:

Grade of wool.	Present average market price in Philadelphia, December, 1887, under tariff act of 1883.	Per cent. of shrinkage.	Scoured cost. This table was prepared by Messrs. Justice Bateman & Co., wool commission merchants, of Philadelphia, and is computed upon the then current market prices for like grades, and very clearly shows that if Ohio wool is brought into competition with like grades found in the English markets, it must be bought at from 6 to 17 cents less per pound, varying according to grade, than was paid in 1887, if the buyer would be safe; and that is precisely what is being done now in that State.

Of course this would be unnecessary and extortionate if such competition would not exist, even though this bill should pass. But such competition would arise. Why, Mr. Chairman, even under the present law it exists to a degree likely to ruin our sheep industry. You have seen how, since the law of 1883 was passed, the number of sheep and pounds of wool produced by us are steadily and surely diminishing; and the reason for this is to be found in the increased importations, mainly from the English market.

We imported in 1883, year ending June 30, the following quantities and kinds of wool, all told:

	Pounds.
Class 1, clothing wools	11,546,530
Class 2, combing wools	1,373,113
Class 3, carpet wools	40,130,322
Total	53,049,965

And this importation came in under the tariff of 1867, which imposed a duty whose average ad valorem equivalent was 45.11 per cent.

Under the tariff of 1883, imposing a duty whose average ad valorem equivalent is 41.77 per cent., we imported for the year ending June 30, 1887, the following quantities and kinds of wool, namely:

	Pounds.
Class 1, clothing wools	23,195,734
Class 2, combing wools	9,703,962
Class 3, carpet wools	81,504,477
Total	114,404,173

Of this wool England and her colonies produced and furnished us with the following quantities, namely:

	Pounds.
Class 1, clothing wools	11,256,920
Class 2, combing wools	8,464,587
Class 3, carpet wools	23,550,882
Or a total amount produced by them of	43,272,389

There were also shipped from ports in England, in the same year, the following additional quantities, namely:

	Pounds.
Class 1, clothing wools	375,767
Class 2, combing wools	1,477,287
Class 3, carpet wools	39,542,728
Or a total amount of wools purchased by English merchants and resold to the United States of	41,395,782

Thus it will be seen that England and her possessions furnished us in all, last year, 84,668,171 pounds of wool, or about fourteen-nineteenths of the whole amount of our importations. It will be no task, I apprehend, in the light of these facts, to see what foreign nation is demanding "free wool" in the United States. Nor will the task be any harder when the question is asked, "For whose benefit does England make this demand?" It is because in this, as in all other lines of commerce, she wants the American markets for England, and for England only. She owes no allegiance to the United States. She furnishes no men to fight the battles of this Union. Her sons can not be drafted into our armies to be slain, if need be, in defense of our flag. She bears none of the burdens of carrying on our Government. On the contrary, if we are to judge by her conduct in the past, she would as lief sell to our enemies as to us, and has, in all ways possible, given us to understand that she has no use for us, except for her enrichment, regardless of the injury that may result to our people and institutions, growing out of her avarice and because of competition with her degraded and poorly paid labor. It is with her a question of money to be made, and that alone, which induces her Cobden Club and free-trade theorists to cry "free wool" to this nation. The wonder is that any American who loves his country and desires to see it prosper can be so blind and deluded as to fail to see the real motive behind this specious and deluding cry.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another matter involved in the statistics to which I have called attention, which I would note here. It is that when the rates of duty are lowered the amount of the revenue is increased. This bill proposes to reduce the revenues by putting certain articles on the free-list and by reducing the tariff on others. The revenue may be reduced by taking a duty entirely off. But great care must be taken where the tariff is only reduced in amount, if we would avoid an increase of revenue by reason of increased importations. The estimate of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, based upon the importations of last year, of the amount of reduction to be effected by the rates of duties upon articles which still remain dutiable, although at a reduced rate, is as follows:

Importations of dutiable articles for year ending June 30, 1887, upon which by the Mills bill some duty is still left	$178,329,048
Duties collected upon these for year 1887	117,663,127
Proposed reduction of amount of duties	31,530,941
	Per cent.
Average ad valorem rate now on these articles	65.98
Average ad valorem rate proposed thereon by Mills bill	48.30
Amount to be remitted, average rate	17.68

By the tariff of 1867 for the year ending June 30, 1883, we collected of revenue on wool a sum total of $3,174,628. Our importations for that year were, as before stated, 53,049,965 pounds under a tariff duty of about 5 per cent. less ad valorem equivalent. We collected revenue on wool for the year ending June 30, 1887, a sum total of $5,901,469 on an importation of 114,404,173 pounds. So that it is here seen how a reduction of duties increases importations, and consequently increases the revenue.

The danger line, at which this increase of revenue begins when the rate of duty is lowered, is, when your duty gets below the point where it operates as a bar to importations. If the tariff is high enough to keep out importations, then it will yield but little revenue. If it is just high enough to give the home producer a shade the advantage over his foreign competitor, it will yield somewhat more revenue, but still not enough to do any injury. But if it is only high enough so that the shade of advantage is in favor of the foreign competitor, then importations rush in, monopolize your market, increase your revenue, and ruin your home production.

That we got the wool industry into this last state by the act of 1883 is now apparent to any one. There are only two ways of disposing of the matter: First, take off the tariff on wool entirely and permit the foreign product to monopolize our market, destroy our flocks, injure our farmers, make way with our prosperity in that regard, and thus stop the revenue; or second, raise the tariff on wool to the point where it was before the act of 1883 was passed, and give to this most important national resource an impetus only to be found in preserving our home market for our home productions. Of the two ways I prefer the second; and my voice and vote shall be found in that line until our laws are so framed as to bring about that result. I know it is claimed that while the duty on wool benefits the farmer, it is more than offset by the amount of the tariff he is compelled to pay upon his woolen goods. This proposition I utterly deny; and I invite a critical and close consideration of the question. Let us suppose a case: A farmer has 50 sheep in his flock. These sheep yield an average fleece of 5 pounds, or, in all, 250 pounds of washed wool. This rates, under the act of 1883, one-half as clothing and one-half as combing-wools, and as such averages 11 cents per pound tariff, if imported.

If, as the "free-trader" argues, the farmer pays the tariff on his woolens, then it follows he gets the tariff on the wool he sells, or on his 250 pounds of wool he realizes the additional sum of $27.50 because of the tariff. This wool, preparatory to being worked into cloth, will make 83½ pounds of scoured wool, and it takes not quite seven-eighths of a pound of this scoured wool to make 1 yard of cassimere, known in the trade as "men's all-wool clothing," and can be bought at the factory, at wholesale, for 88 cents per yard; and suits made of it retail at from $8 to $12 throughout the Union. Under the rulings of the Treasury Department regarding worsteds this quality of cloth comes in at an average tariff cost of 30 cents per yard. So that, if the farmer purchased 90 yards per year of this cloth, and thus, as "free-traders" claim, pays the whole tariff, he would pay but $27 additional, and would still be 50 cents ahead on the whole transaction. But now we have supposed that he buys back 90 yards of this cloth in one year. This would make thirteen men's suits.

As a matter of fact no ordinary farmer or farmer's family will in a year use one-half of that amount of cloth or its equivalent. So, reckoning it at one-half, his gain in the whole transaction by the tariff would be $14. But the fact is that such clothing as our ordinary Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Indiana wools produce, and which is the kind most commonly in use among our farming population, is sold quite as cheaply with us as it is in London. The finer grades of cloth here are higher than there; but this grade of clothing retails very nearly as low here as there. So I am informed by those having knowledge of London retail prices for this class of clothing.

The truth of this was well illustrated in the remarks of my colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY], who, not long since, in this discussion, gave us the occular evidence of it; and I can not resist making the statement here that no man on the other side of the House has answered or refuted the statements he made regarding wool blankets, or, indeed, any other statement contained in his masterly exposition of this subject, nor has any attempt to do so been made.

That competition among our home woolen manufacturers has brought about this era of cheap woolens is too well established to need argument. Do you ask, then, why the need of a tariff? I answer:

First. That we may preserve the American market for the American wool-grower.

Second. That we may not by the destruction of our flocks be placed at the mercy of foreign producers.

Third. That there may be accorded to the American farmer the protection on this product of his farm which is accorded to other branches of trade.

Fourth. That this source of national wealth and prosperity may not be lost to us because of the cheapness of the foreign product.

Fifth. That our money, which would otherwise go to the foreign producer of wool, may be kept here at home to pay our debts and circulate among us, thereby enriching our people.

Sixth. That the principle of protection may not be applied to the manufacturer of wool and be denied at the same time to the producer of it. If one is protected the other should be, and I am for protecting both of them.

When gentlemen declare that this reduction on wool is made for the purpose of enabling the manufacturer to obtain "cheap raw materials," and so put it into his power to pay better wages to labor, and sell cheaper cloth to the laboring man, I would ask who labors harder than your farmer? Who puts in more hours of work in twenty-four than he? Who is more worthy of the care and regard of Government than the man furnishing its bread? You keep the tariff on the manufactured product, and indulge in the poetical and fallacious idea that manufacturers are then to be willing to pay more for labor than now, and are going to sell for less money than the market warrants them in asking, because you were so generous in leaving them some protection; and this is accompanied by the implied threat that if your expectations are not realized you will come back at them with a still further reduction until their protection is absolutely gone, thus demanding, as the price of giving the manufacturer and his labor this protection, that he and they shall reverse a law of trade older than Congresses, and buy and sell regardless of supply and demand.

And this illusory view is advanced for the good of less than 3,000,000 persons engaged in protected industries, taking the number to be as stated in the President's message, while this wool industry, in which, from the same authority, 7,670,493 farmers are interested to the extent of at least $120,000,000, as shown by the census of 1880, you propose to leave without any protection; and, as I have shown, thus utterly destroy and annihilate it.

Mr. Chairman, the theory of protection, properly applied, results in no such absurd and untenable position. It confines the place of supply to the United States as to the things we can produce in sufficient quantities to meet, or approximately to meet, the demands of our people. In doing this it does not confine its beneficial effects to one industry or to a few favored pursuits; but it declares that as to all industries which are or may be established and which are likely in time to supply the demand of our people we will confine the purchases of such things by our citizens to our own home markets as far as a tariff reasonably can or ought to do so; that this will keep our money at home to be invested in home enterprises; that it will develop our natural resources in all directions; that it will diversify the occupations of our people; that it will thus furnish employment for our labor; that under this system our laborers need not be all farmers or all anything else, but may be profitably engaged among us in nearly if not quite all the business pursuits and industries known to man.

But it is not found within this principle of protection that one great industry among us shall be stricken down and destroyed in order to furnish to another "raw materials," so called.

This is antagonistic to and destructive of the principle of protection, and is the one subtle and insinuating way in which its enemies approach it and seek to overthrow the system. For, if a large body of the adherents of the protective theory can be thus split off from the main column of its supporters, by taking one industry at a time and removing the duties from it, so that those engaged therein have none of the benefits of the system, our opponents hope to be re-enforced by them, and thus finally be able to destroy the system itself, by the aid of those thus alienated from its support.

It is the indirect mode of attack that seeks to divide the army and then destroy its separate parts. But fortunately for the protective system, and, therefore, for the country, in this instance, the attack is obliged to assume that the American people are fools, and can not see what is really meant by such an approach. And it will fail, as all projects thus presuming on the intelligence of the people, should fail and do fail.

It may be argued by some that we at least ought to let carpet wools in free because we can not produce them. The answer to this is that it is a mistake to suppose we can not produce our carpet wools. The dry plains of Western Texas, Colorado, and of the Territories of Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico are especially adapted to the support of flocks of Mexican sheep, which multiply rapidly and furnish a superior carpet wool. We can also use the poorer kinds of all other wools produced by us for that purpose. And we actually did produce over 20,000,000 pounds of carpet wools in 1887. If gentleman would be convinced of our ability in this direction let them restore the tariff of 1867, and in less than five years it will not require argument to show them it can be done, and be done cheaply. The facts alone, then, will convince the most skeptical. I am in favor of letting Americans produce the 80,000,000 pounds or more of carpet wools we imported in 1887, when they have both the capacity and the soil to enable them to do it.

I would pay to American labor and skill and to American citizens every possible dollar I could before going abroad to purchase anything needed in our American life. By following such a policy we will build up our own people, support our own poor, augment our national wealth, and transmit to our children a nation rich in wealth, wise in statesmanship, and strong in the love of its people. The plan of reducing the surplus by a cowardly surrender of our wool market and industry to a foreign rival is, in my opinion, the veriest imbecility, and the men who counsel and compel it are certainly committing a blunder the evil effects of which can not be computed.

The raw wool when prepared for market can not be called "raw material" in any proper sense of the term. It may be called such as regards the manufacturer of woolens in the sense of a "trade term," but it is a misnomer considered in the original meaning of the words used. I will enumerate the items of expense which enter into the preparation of a fleece of washed wool for the market.

First. Cost of the sheep from which it is shorn.
Second. Cost of keeping the sheep for one year.
Third. Cost of shearing and washing the sheep.
Fourth. Cost of marketing the wool.

These four items of cost must be met and overcome by the possible increase of the flock and the sum realized from the annual sale of the fleece. Now, to say that a fleece of wool thus produced, which requires the farmer's work and labor, the consumption of his hay and grain, the use of his land, and the investment of his money, is a "raw material" is to pervert the meaning of language. It is material advanced a long step towards the manufactured cloth, and, as the statistics and the experience of wool-growers amply show, can not be profitably advanced to this stage under the tariff of 1883 as against foreign competition. The policy, therefore, of placing wool upon the free-list means, as I have said, the utter destruction and annihilation of sheep husbandry in this Union, and the surrender of this great element of national growth and wealth entirely to foreign producers.

Mr. Chairman, when this result so plainly appears to be the natural effect of this bill, I confess, sir, I can not appreciate or commend the feeling that prompts an American citizen to occupy the anomalous position of professing a great love for his people and his country's institutions, yet finds himself willing to consent to strike down and destroy so necessary and so important a national resource. For myself, I believe that allegiance to and love of the laws, the institutions, and the people of my country is measured by a different standard and evidenced by a different course of action.

I would not charge that gentlemen of a different view than the one I entertain are unpatriotic, but I do say that gentlemen can do as great an injury to the nation by following and establishing a mistaken and destructive theory as by following a deliberate purpose to damage it.

The effect of a mistaken thrust of the dagger is as dangerous and hurtful as an intentional stab. And I earnestly urge upon gentlemen to support these amendments and restore the 1867 tariff upon wool, and again place it in the power of our farmers to profitably raise wool, and thus enable them to reach a better and more prosperous condition, and so add to the wealth and greatness of our whole people.

Now, in conclusion, I would put the following question to gentlemen upon the other side of this House, and I earnestly hope that they, or some of them, will give me an honest answer to the inquiry:

By the Mills bill you place upon the free-list fifty-three different industries that have heretofore enjoyed protection to a greater or lesser extent. You reduce the duties on a multitude of others. You say you hope, in spite of experience to the contrary, to effect a large reduction of the revenue by this action.

Suppose the bill should become a law, and it should hereafter be found that instead of reducing revenues it actually increases them, because of the flood of importations it brings in. Where then do you next propose to strike? Will you take off the internal taxes? Or, following the principle of the Mills bill, will you still essay the reduction of revenue by placing more protected articles and industries upon the free-list? I take it no man of ordinary sense would be at a loss to see that the logic of your bill is ultimately a strictly revenue tariff, such as England now has, and that means death to the protective system; and an honest answer to this question will unmask the meaning of the President's message, the intent of the Mills bill, and the true meaning of the tariff plank in the Democratic platform recently adopted, if such unmasking is at all needed to expose that meaning. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the statistics to which he refers include those of the United States.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I have not included those.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Because I think it would be admirable if they were also embodied in the tables to which the gentleman refers.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair). The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FITCH. I hope additional time will be granted.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I should like to have five minutes' extension.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

[Mr. BOOTHMAN then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

[Mr. DOCKERY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I do not know whether the programme of speakers has been arranged or not. If it has been, I do not want to interfere with it, and although I had no voice in the arrangement, I have been taught politeness and do not want to interfere with it. But, sir, if I am permitted, I would like to answer the question which was put to me whether this country could produce wool enough without large importation, I answer, yes, that this country can produce 90 per cent. of all the wool necessary to have here if we are given the opportunity to do so. There is no question about that fact. And if it were true that we can not produce sufficient wool, neither can we produce sufficient rice nor sugar, and yet gentlemen insist, while protection is kept up upon sugar and rice, wool shall be practically free.

As a matter of fact the Mills bill has paralyzed the wool industry in Michigan. The farmers there can get only 22 to 25 cents for their best wool simply and solely because of the threatened danger by the Mills bill. When I state that I state what is known to everybody in the State of Michigan who knows anything about it.

The friends of this bill insist upon free salt. Salt is 60 cents a barrel in Saginaw to-day. Michigan produced 425,000 barrels of salt in the month of June, and a total of 1,800,000 barrels of salt since January 1, and this product of the districts represented by my colleague Mr. WHITING, and my colleague Mr. TARSNEY, sells at 60 cents a barrel, 280 pounds to the barrel, and the barrel itself costs 20 cents.

Yes, these gentlemen take the tax off salt, which goes into the consumption of the whole country, an average of about 50 pounds to each person, and insist that those things which are raised south of Mason and Dixon's line in infinitesimal quantity compared with the amount used shall be protected by a tariff, in the same breath charging us with being sectional. We do not ask the people of the South or the North for anything except fair play and fair treatment, and if these gentlemen think they can, with impunity, strike at every industry in the great State of Michigan, as they seem to think they can, they will find out more about that after the election than perhaps they know now.

They say we will put copper upon the free-list and destroy the copper trust; that we will keep a tariff on sugar and destroy the sugar trust; using opposite remedies for the same disease. We are told that the Republican party, by its adherence to the present system, is injuring American industry and is not the friend of American labor.

Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that if the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had not gone to New York and solemnly assured the people there that the Democratic party would not interfere with the tariff to the detriment of the people, the State of New York would have given its electoral vote for Mr. Blaine in 1884. But as a matter of fact he so said, and fought hard to keep his party to his pledge, and for such adherence has been practically read out of the party.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not desire to discuss the pending amendment, but rather to state a matter personal to myself.

Mr. Chairman, in some remarks which I had the honor to submit during the general debate on this bill, on the 2d of May last, I declared my purpose to offer or support an amendment to reduce the duties on the manufactured products of wool to an average ad valorem of 25 per cent. I am still of the opinion that these duties ought to be reduced, and under ordinary circumstances I would faithfully execute the intention then expressed. It was done in advance of the authoritative action of the conventions of my party, both in my own State and at St. Louis, and before the Democratic Representatives in Congress had held any conference with reference to the line of policy to be pursued upon this bill.

In good faith I submitted and urged before our party council, held in this Hall, the amendment mentioned; and while I believe it ought to have been adopted, still in the judgment of a majority of my political associates it was deemed inexpedient to disturb in this respect the measure reported by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means.

This bill has received the sanction and approval of the Democratic party, and has become essentially a party measure. We all realize the necessity of accomplishing something by way of tariff reduction and relieving the people from unjust taxation. This can only be done through that strength which comes from united action. I for one am not willing to incur the responsibility of endangering the passage of the bill or standing in the way of any reform contemplated by its provisions, and I have resolved what doubts I have entertained as to my own proper course in this matter into the general duty of fidelity to the conclusions reached by that party to which I belong. And in keeping with its councils and declarations I shall yield for the time being my personal inclinations to its aggregate wisdom and decline to break its ranks in favor of any individual committal or conviction. I have felt it my duty to commit to the record this statement of the reasons which actuate my conduct.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, as I have said before, I have no expectation that anything that can be said on this side of the House will in the least change the text or character of this bill, because it has been ordained by the caucus of the majority that no change is to be made in the same except by such amendments as are offered by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I should not take further time of this committee was it not for the fact that I desire to correct some statements made by my colleague [Mr. FORD] in a speech made by him on this floor on the 27th day of April last. In that speech my colleague used this language in speaking of the effect of the duty on foreign wools:

> Take the result in my State, for instance, the State of Michigan. In 1867 the wool tariff was enormously increased. In that year the tariff on wool was raised so that it averaged between 50 and 60 per cent., and it so continued, practically without interruption, for sixten years. In 1867, when the tariff went into effect, there were 4,000,000 sheep in the State, and under the effect of the high tariff on wool, on the 1st of January, 1880, the number of those sheep had dwindled down to less than 2,000,000.

My colleague made a similar statement in a communication some time previous, addressed to the president of the Sheep-Breeders' Association in my own State. I do not know where he got that information, for it certainly was from no official report. I find from the census reports for the years here given the following facts: In the year 1860 the census report shows there were 1,271,743 sheep in Michigan; in 1870 there were 1,985,906, and in 1880 there were 2,189,389.

In 1867 there was no official report, either State or national, showing the number of sheep in Michigan, but if my colleague will take the pains to look at the census reports he will find there must have been considerably less than 2,000,000 sheep in Michigan at that time, or less than one-half the number stated by him. According to the returns made to the secretary of state for Michigan in 1884, under the State census of that year, there were 2,896,911 sheep in the State, which largely exceeded any number before that given. I concede that since the reduction of the duty on wool under the act of 1883 there has been a reduction in the number of sheep in our State. This has been caused partially by a reduction of the duty at that time, and partially comes from the fact that for ten years there has been no single Congress that there has not been a bill pending here to reduce the duties upon foreign imports, wool and other articles. These bills have hung like a pall over the industries of the country, and our flock-raisers have suffered heavy losses by reason thereof; and to-day they are receiving from 5 to 8 cents less for each pound of their wool than they would have received had not this bill been pending.

For ten years they have been harassed by proposed or threatened legislation, antagonistic to their interests, until many of our farmers have been lessening their flocks or entirely disposing of the same. When the party now in power succeeded in the election of 1884, the farmers of my State, being aware of its free-trade tendencies, and of the unfavorable legislation which it had threatened touching sheep husbandry, have been compelled to meet the threatened emergency by depleting their flocks. If the farmers of the country could have the assurance that a reasonable and proper duty could be maintained upon foreign wool for ten years, we should at the end of that time have no need to import a pound of foreign wools, for a sufficient amount would be produced in our own country; but so long as the present party shall remain in power, just so long will our tariff laws be unstable, uncertain, and demoralizing to the business interests of the country.

In connection with my remarks I here give a table showing the reduction of duty on wool and certain kinds of woolen goods by the act of 1883, and the effect of such reduction upon imports.

The increase in the amount of clothing wool imported during the three years succeeding the reduction of duty in 1883 exceeded the amount imported for the three previous years 11,852,873 pounds, and of combing wools 3,125,774 pounds, and of carpet wools 63,299,783 pounds, and of rags, shoddy, waste, flocks, etc., 2,278,779 pounds, while under the lower rate of duty there was collected $1,062,367.96 more duty during the three years succeeding the revision of 1883 than there was during the three years preceding the same, showing that by a reduction of the rate of duty the imports are so increased that the aggregate of duty is continually increased also. The same thing occurs in the case of worsted cloths, woolen yarns, knit goods, ladies' woolen wearing apparel, etc. With the entire abolition of the duty on raw wool can any one doubt that the most of our wool will be imported, and sheep husbandry in the United States become a thing of the past? With the proposed decrease in the rate of duty upon woolen goods the importations will be so increased that the duty collected in the aggregate upon such goods will largely exceed that collected now under the present law. The only reductions made in the customs revenue under this bill will be upon such articles as are placed upon the free-list. The sole object of the bill, if we are to determine its object by its context, seems to be to increase importations. The Democratic majority in this House, as well as the Democratic party at its recent convention, has determined that this bill must pass, and that it is in the interest of our own industries and the labor of our own country that the wants of our people be supplied by the production of foreign lands. The Republican party, on the contrary, demands such legislation as shall tend to supply the wants of our own people from the productions of our own labor, legislation, which shall tend to foster our own industries and provide labor with fair wages for our own people.

The President in his message and other addresses presents all the arguments adduced by the most rabid free-trader, and yet he asserts that the question of free trade or protection is not in issue. He urges the placing of wool and other articles called "raw material" upon the free-list, and to that extent he certainly must be a free-trader. Henry George and every free-trader in America supports Grover Cleveland for President. Every free-trader in England favors the re-election of Grover Cleveland, for they know that his views are in harmony with their own, even though he may refuse to be classed with them. Let us see what they say. The London Times of July 6, 1888, in commenting upon the remarks of President Cleveland upon receiving official notice of his renomination, uses this language:

It would hardly be possible to put the free-trade case more clearly or more strongly, and yet such is the force of words President Cleveland shrinks from the use of the term "free trade," and in fact declares that those who taunt him with being a free-trader are deceiving the country. "Free trade" appears to be equivalent, in the language of American political controversy, to "enemy of the workingmen and of industrial enterprises."

That it should be so is one of the curiosities of politics, and an extraordinary instance of the power of a phrase even over minds which are commonly shrewd and reasonable; for it is certain that the arguments which President Cleveland urges are those which Cobden used to employ forty-five years ago, and which any English free-trader would employ now. Such propositions as that taxation ought to be strictly limited by the needs of the country; that it is unjust to tax the whole community for the benefit of special classes; that import duties stifle production and limit the area of a country's markets are purely free-trade arguments. As such we are glad to see President Cleveland using them, though we are sorry for the popular infatuation which makes it dangerous to give them their right name.

Most of the London and other English press construe the President's language in a similar manner and arrive at similar conclusions touching his views upon the tariff question. The London Daily News, the great Liberal organ, of the same date, uses the following language:

President Cleveland's speech is more to the point. He discusses the principles at issue in the struggle and shows that he is the free-trade candidate in everything but name. The reservation is an important one for American party purposes. The President feels compelled to characterize the attempt to brand him as a free-trader as deception, but for all that the electoral conflict now in progress is a conflict between free trade and protection, and nothing less. This is a very good conflict as things go, and, like warfare between good and evil, it threatens to be perpetual. Mr. Cleveland may find a more formidable antagonist in General Harrison than we have been led to expect.

As well might the President and his supporters in this House say that England is not a free-trade country as to claim that the policy advocated and the arguments used by them here must not inevitably lead to free trade. There is no country in the world which has absolute free trade. England has not, for on many articles imported she levies a high rate of duty. Her tariff laws are framed "for revenue only," and yet we all call England a free-trade country. Is there a Democrat here upon this floor that is not in favor of a tariff for revenue only? Your party has often declared in its national conventions for this. Why, then, does the President shrink from admitting his desire for free trade as England has it to-day? Why is it that our Democratic friends here argue for English free trade and yet deny that they are free-traders? The whole scope of their argument has been that protection in itself is wrong per se; that it is robbing one class of our people for the benefit of another class; that protection tends to restrict trade and is therefore detrimental to our industries and tends to oppress our labor. If this be so, then how can our Democratic friends say they are not for the opposite of protection, to wit, free trade or the English system of a tariff for revenue only? The allegations made by the English press as above quoted can not be gainsaid. The construction put upon the President's utterances and the acts of his party in this House are too plain to be refuted by any statement of the President. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who is the leader in this House, during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, in discussing the "Morrison bill," used this language:

We must remove, both by legislation and diplomacy, every hindering cause that prevents the free exchange of products of our labor in all the markets of the world. We must unfetter every arm and let every muscle strike for the highest remuneration of toil. We must let wealth, the creation of labor, grow up in all the homes of our people. Then every industry will spring forward at a bound, and wealth, prosperity, and power will bless the land that is dedicated to free men, free labor, and free trade. (See volume 66, page 2990, of RECORD.)

This was in 1884. On April 24, 1878, in discussing the "Wood tariff bill," Mr. MILLS uses this language:

The committee could have imposed duties at 20 per cent., as a general rule, making a few exceptions above that standard and many below, and raise one hundred millions instead of one hundred and forty-one. The next year the same duties would bring one hundred and twenty millions, because the imports would be largely increased by the lower duties. Our policy should be to take the smallest amount of taxes that we can by customs; and we should gradually decrease the amount until our customs taxes come alone from no competing articles entering our custom houses. We now have over a hundred millions from whisky and tobacco and other internal taxes, but they are on the same principle as the tariff taxes on consumption, and fall on the poor, and should be largely decreased. (See volume 29 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2793.)

Here the honorable gentleman declares for a tariff for revenue only, such as they have in England, and which is known as free trade there. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] compares protection with highway robbery, and votes for the lowest possible reduction of duty on everything, unless the Democratic caucus orders otherwise. Many speakers upon the other side have boldly declared that this bill does not go as far towards free trade as they wished, but they would support it as the best they could get, while other leaders of the party counsel moderation until the party gets full control of the executive and legislative departments of the Government. Can any one doubt, then, that the Democratic party to-day is essentially a free-trade party? The question in this campaign is protection vs. free trade, and there should be no avoiding the issue which our friends have made. If that party has the courage of its convictions they should stand by the issue they have made and let the people render their verdict accordingly.

The duty on wool and woolen goods should be restored to what it was under the act of 1867, with slight modifications in the classification; but it is entirely useless to point out what should be done when it is well known that no change in the bill can be made in this House. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has taken occasion to allude to what he calls the glorious history of the Democratic party and its love for the laboring man. Let me state that if the Democratic party is entitled to any glory it must be for acts performed in its early history and not in later years. If it has ever had any love for labor in this country it has failed to manifest that fact except by word of mouth, certainly not by any affirmative act. Up to a few years ago that party in the South claimed and exercised the right to own its own labor, and was sustained in that position by the Democrats of the North. That party since its resumption of power has enacted no legislation in the interest of labor or of laboring men. To-day it tells us it seeks to relieve labor of its burdens, and how? By increasing the importation of the products of foreign labor and thereby depriving our own labor from producing that which goes to supply the wants of our people, by building up foreign industries and destroying our own.

Let me tell my friend that the attempt of this House to carry out such policy is greatly depressing our industries and depriving thousands of laborers of honest employment at fair and remunerative wages, and these men will be heard in November next. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have had for some time in my hands remonstrances signed by some fifteen hundred of my constituents against the putting of wool on the free-list or reducing the rate of duty thereon. As the bill had been reported to the House before they reached me, I have refrained from presenting the same until the present time, that I might the better call the attention of the House to the feeling possessed by our farmers touching this question.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BREWER. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to occupy ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BREWER resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my protest against the proposition of the Democractic majority of the Ways and Means Committee to place imported Canadian, South American, and Australian wool on the free-list.

I protest against it, first, because it is a grave injustice to the farmers of Maine and of other States who raise wool, and especially injurious to agriculture. Under the present law imported clothing wool pays a duty of 10 cents per pound for medium and 12 cents per pound for fine; and the Mills bill proposes to remove the whole of this duty, and to bring wool-growers of this country into free and open competition, not only with the wool-growers of Canada, but also of South America. I desire to ask the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, who have reported this bill, how they defend such injustice to our farmers as placing imported wool on the free-list, while they impose a duty of 100 per cent. on imported rice to protect Southern rice, 68 per cent. on sugar to protect Southern sugar, and 40 per cent. on so crude an article as bituminous coal to protect Virginia and Maryland coal?

NOT GIVE CHEAPER CLOTHING PERMANENTLY.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] replies that their object is to make clothing cheaper for the masses of the people. But if it is really a blessing to the people to crush out wool-growing in the United States, as this bill certainly will; if the entire abolition of the duty on wool will produce a condition of things which will permanently give the people cheaper clothing, which I deny, then I ask the gentleman why he confines his "blessing" to wool produced by the farmers of this country, and at the same time refuses to give the farmers free sugar, free rice, free coal, free everything? Why call upon the farmers who grow wool to bear all the sacrifices to secure a great "blessing" for others, and refuse to give them compensatory blessings?

But, Mr. Chairman, I deny that free wool would be a permanent advantage to the people, even in the matter of clothing. Temporarily there would be cheaper wool, because foreign wool would come in free. But as soon as our farmers killed off their flocks and stopped raising wool (as they would be compelled to with free wool) then the large falling off of production consequent on the giving up of wool-raising in this country would advance the price abroad and any temporary advantage would be largely lost. But there would be an offset to any temporary advantage arising from the fact that the ability of our farmers to purchase articles for consumption would be diminished to the extent of the destruction of their former income from wool-raising. Indeed, after twenty-seven years' protection of wool-growing, woolen cloth is 30 per cent. cheaper than it was before the war under non-protection. There never was a time when clothing was so cheap, and the workingman can buy a coat in the United States for two-thirds the labor that he can buy a similar coat in Great Britain. In addition to this loss, the destruction of the wool-raising in this country would have a serious effect on the supply of meat and increase the price of mutton, which now forms so large a part of the meat supply of the people. And beyond this whatever tends to discourage sheep-raising injuriously affects the fertility of our farms, for it is well known that sheep have a most beneficial influence in renovating worn-out lands on which they are pastured.

IMPORTANCE OF SHEEP-RAISING.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said, in the progress of this debate, that sheep-raising and wool-growing are matters of little consequence to the people of the United States. President Cleveland in his last annual message, which recommended placing wool on the free-list, conveyed the impression that only a few farmers are interested in sheep-raising.

Mr. J. R. Dodge, the statistician of the Agricultural Department, reports that January 1, 1888, there were 43,544,755 sheep in the United States, valued at $89,279,926, distributed as follows:

As the average weight of wool per head is now about 6 pounds, the production of wool in the United States last year was about 265,000,000 pounds, valued at $66,000,000.

In 1884 the number of sheep in the United States was 50,626,626, and the production of wool reached 308,000,000 pounds, the largest annual wool crop ever marketed in this country. In 1880 the number of sheep was 40,765,900, and the production of wool 240,000,000 pounds. In 1875 the number of sheep was 33,783,600, and the production of wool 192,000,000 pounds. In 1870 number of sheep 28,477,951, and production of wool 100,102,387 pounds. In 1860 number of sheep 22,471,271, and the production of wool 60,511,343 pounds. In 1850 number of sheep 21,723,220, and wool clip 52,516,959 pounds. In 1840 number of sheep 19,311,374, and wool clip 35,000,000 pounds.

It will be observed that in twenty years between 1840 and 1860, all but four years under a revenue tariff policy, the number of sheep in the United States increased only 20 per cent., and the clip of wool 70 per cent., while in the twenty years between 1860 and 1880 the number of sheep increased 80 per cent. and the clip of wool 300 per cent.

In 1885 the United States was second to only Australasia, with a clip of 455,470,000 pounds, in her production of wool. The Argentine Republic came third with a clip of 283,047,000 pounds; Russia fourth, with a clip of 262,966,000 pounds, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain fifth, with a clip of 135,936,000 pounds. The total wool clip of the world was 1,825,788,000 pounds, the United States, with a clip of 302,000,000 pounds, producing one-sixth of the whole.

The most remarkable feature of the progress of wool-growing in the United States has been the rapid increase in the average weight of the fleece. In 1840 this was barely 1.85 pounds; in 1850 it was 2.42 pounds; in 1860 it was 2.68; in 1870 it was 3.52; in 1880 it was 4.79; and in 1887 it was 6 pounds.

In 1860 this country produced little over 2 pounds of wool to each inhabitant; in 1880, over 4 pounds; and in 1885, over 5 pounds.

Between 1850 and 1860 our imported woolens averaged annually $1.09 per inhabitant; between 1860 and 1870, 91 cents, and between 1870 and 1880, 86 cents; showing that under protection we are coming nearer and nearer to supplying our own markets.

In 1886 our consumption of wool was 399,081,000 pounds, of which we produced 285,000,000 pounds, or 72 per cent., and imported 114,401,173 pounds, or 28 per cent.

Of the wool imported only 23,195,734 pounds were clothing wool, 9,703,962 pounds combing wool, and 81,504,477 pounds coarse carpet wool.

The value of our woolen manufactures in 1880 was $267,252,913 (more than the value of the woolen manufactures of Great Britain), and the value of the same imported was $35,776,559, making the total consumption of woolen goods in that year $303,029,472, or about $6 per inhabitant—a constantly increasing consumption of woolens.

These figures, striking as they are, give an incomplete idea of the importance of the wool-growing and sheep-raising industry to our farmers and the country; and this industry in the United States the Mills bill proposes to wreck by allowing foreign wool, produced by cheaper labor, to come into our markets free of duty to compete with it.

EFFECT OF FREE WOOL.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that an attempt has been made to show that wool will not decline in price under free trade, and therefore to claim that free wool will not hurt the farmer. The Democratic candidate for Congress in the district in which I have the honor to represent (C. E. Allen, esq.), presents this claim in his letter of acceptance, as follows:

> After twenty years of protection on wool, we have about two-thirds of a sheep per inhabitant, and a sheep gives annually less than 5 pounds of wool. Pray, tell me, wool-raisers, will you let us freeze in some of these blizzards for the lack of wool from somewhere? Wool did not decline in price when free of duty. Singular, isn't it? They tickle the farmer with 10 cents a pound on his fleece and aim to get 50 cents per pound on his clothing.

The amusing part of this claim that wool would be as high under free trade as under protection is that it is put forth as a companion of another claim that free wool will cheapen woolen cloth to the consumer by reducing the cost of the material. Our free-trade friends can not occupy both positions at once from their point of view.

As a matter of fact we have not had free clothing wool in the United States since 1824. From 1824 to 1857, and even under the low tariff of 1846, the duty was 30 per cent.; from 1857 to 1861 it was 24 per cent., and between 1867 and 1883 it was an equivalent of 50 per cent., and since 40 per cent.

So that the statement that "wool did not decline in price when free of duty" is meaningless, because, until the present time for sixty-five years, we have had no President or Congress that has thought it just, wise, or safe to place wool on the free-list, and it is suggestive that since the Mills bill threatened free wool it has declined 7 cents in price. If free-wool threatened has done this, what will free wool enacted into law do?

Nothing can be clearer than if wool is admitted free of duty it will result in a decline of wool nearly to the extent of the duty. But after this decline has wrecked wool-growing in this country, and one-sixth of the production of the world been lost, does any one doubt that foreign wool-growers will take advantage of the situation to increase the price, so that the ultimate result will be greater cost of wool for clothing?

While the inevitable tendency of the largely increased production of wool in the world has been to reduce the price of wool everywhere, yet the effect of our tariff has been to keep the price of wool in this country higher than it would have been or will be under free wool. In other words, protection has encouraged sheep-raising and has led to such attention to breeding that now the weight per fleece is three times what it was in 1860, and even 30 cents per pound pays better than 40 cents would have paid in 1860.

Under protection we are coming nearer and nearer every decade to growing all our clothing wool. In 1860 we produced only 2 pounds of wool per inhabitant, and in 1885, 5 pounds per inhabitant. In 1886 we imported only 23,000,000 pounds of clothing wool, while 270,000,000 of clothing wool were raised and used at home.

If we should admit foreign wool to our markets free of duty, the temporary effect would be to cheapen price until our chief industry was destroyed, and then the destruction of one-sixth of the world's wool clip would result in higher prices for wool and dearer clothing. The American farmer would be sacrificed, and then the consumer would ultimately have to pay more for his clothing and his mutton. It is no wonder that the farmers of the United States represented by the Wool-Growers' Association have united in a remonstrance against the proposition of the Mill's bill to place wool on the free-list, as follows:

> The wool-dealers and wool-growers of the United States, representing a capital of over $500,000,000 and a constituency of a million wool-growers and wool-dealers, assembled in conference in the city of Washington this 7th day of December, 1887, having read the first annual message of the President to the Fiftieth Congress, declare that the sentiments of the message are a direct attack upon their industry, one of the most important of the country and in positive violation of the national Democratic platform of 1884, as interpreted by the party leaders and accepted by the rank and file of the party; that the argument made by the President for the removal of our protection against foreign competition is the old one, repeatedly made by the enemies of our industrial progress, and effectively answered in nearly every school district of our land, and so thoroughly disproved by the logic of facts and the demonstrations of experience and history, as to need no answer from us. We acknowledge that our "small holdings," our scattered and unorganized condition, make us the easy prey of the free-trader, but we had a right to expect something different from the Chief Executive of the nation, at once the most happy, prosperous, and contented of any of the world, made so by a policy of protection and development which he now seeks to destroy. We had a right to expect our President would favor the wool-growers of the United States, and confess our deep disappointment that instead he favors the interests of our foreign competitors.

HOW THE FARMERS ARE AFFECTED.

It is not only wool that the Mills bill places on the free-list, but Canadian beans, pease, milk, meats (including mutton and beef), cucumbers, cabbages, turnips, squashes, tomatoes, manufactured lumber, bricks, building-stone, etc., are also admitted free of duty to compete in our markets with our own farm produce.

No wonder the Montreal Gazette, in discussing our coming elections, recently expressed an earnest desire that President Cleveland might be re-elected, with a Democratic Congress, giving these reasons for its choice:

> Canadian people have a special and deep interest in the Presidential contest in the United States. * * * The fishery treaty might possibly be ratified by the Senate, if Mr. Cleveland's administration is approved by the people. * * * There can be no doubt that the chances of its ultimate acceptance will be greatly increased if Mr. Cleveland's administration is indorsed.
> There is, however, an even more important reason why Canadians should wish for the success of Mr. Cleveland. The great issue of the day among our neighbors is tariff reform. * * * Mr. Cleveland's success meaning the passage of the Mills bill, and the passage of the Mills bill meaning a free market in the United States for our lumber, wool, iron ore, salt, and some other products, Canadians will watch with deep interest the progress of the campaign and the final outcome.

What makes this treatment of Northern farmers more unjust is the fact that the Mills bill imposes 68 per cent. on sugar to protect Louisiana, and 100 per cent. on rice to protect South Carolina rice.

INJURIOUS TO WOOLEN MANUFACTURES.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], in defending free wool, laid great stress on the advantage which he declared it would give American woolen manufacturers to have free wool and protected woolen goods.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that great efforts have been made by the promoters of the Mills bill to induce woolen manufacturers to support the measure on this ground. But it is a credit to the sense of honor and fair-dealing which prevails among the great body of woolen manufacturers in the United States that scarcely a dozen of them, and these free-traders, have joined in the support of the Mills bill. Even if it were true that free wool would temporarily promote the interests of woolen manufacturers, yet those gentlemen realize that it would be only by doing injustice to the wool-grower, and that this injustice would speedily react and reach the manufacturer. Indeed, it is well understood that the object of the free-traders in placing wool on the free-list is to endeavor to detach the farmers from the ranks of protectionists, in order that they may have their aid to next greatly reduce or abolish the duties on manufactured goods.

But the passage of the Mills bill could not even temporarily benefit woolen manufacturers. The present tariff imposes on imported woolens a specific pound or square-yard duty, intended to fully cover and a little more than cover the duty on wool, which goes to the farmer, and a manufacturer's duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem on coarse woolens and 40 per cent. on fine. The Mills bill abolishes the duty on wool and also the specific duty on imported woolens, leaving the manufacturer the same ad valorem duty as at present. This does not give the woolen manufacturer any additional vantage ground as against imported goods. Indeed, it diminishes his protection to whatever extent the abolished specific duty (which could not be avoided by undervaluations as an ad valorem duty is) exceeded the actual difference in cost between wool in England and in the United States, which is usually less than the specific duty.

In other words, the woolen manufacturer, with free wool and nothing but the manufacturer's ad valorem duty, which is largely overcome by undervaluations of imports, would not be so well off as now.

The difficulty under which woolen manufacturers are laboring now is not the want of free wool, but because of the Treasury decisions which admit worsted goods at a lower duty than woolens, because of wholesale undervaluations which require specific instead of ad valorem duties, and more intelligent appraisers at the custom-houses, and because of the threat of free wool, which has almost checked the demand for goods.

If the difficulties which woolen manufacturers and employés in woolen mills are called to encounter have been great under a threat of the Mills bill, what would they be with the bill a law of the land!

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has indulged in swelling prophecies of an immense export trade in woolens if we could only have free wool. How unfounded all such prophecies are may be seen by examining the statistics of exports of cotton goods. Notwithstanding we have cotton cheaper than our European rivals, yet we were able last year to export cotton goods to the value of only fifteen millions, and those goods only coarse cottons, in which the labor is a small element, simply for the reason that our labor costs more than it does abroad. If we had free wool, we could not export even fifteen millions of woolens, for the reason that our higher-cost labor would prevent.

We have a domestic market which requires twice as large an amount of woolens as any foreign market, and it is our first duty to retain that, by taking measures to correct the Treasury decision and inequalities in rates which last year allowed the importation of foreign woolens to the value of $44,000,000. With these loopholes stopped up we shall have not only the most flourishing woolen-manufacturing industry, but also the most prosperous wool-growers in the world. Let our motto be protection to both American wool-growers and American woolen manufacturers (for both industries must stand or fall together), as well as protection to every other industry in the land. American markets belong to American producers and workingmen. [Applause.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Before beginning my remarks, and without knowing exactly how much time I shall occupy (though I assure the House I shall be as brief as possible), I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed without interruption until I have completed what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to proceed with his remarks until they are completed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

[Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, of what avail are discussions upon the subject of the tariff if, after full hearing has been had, the people, the final arbiters, are not permitted to register their judgments and to make their final decrees?

It is the argument before a jury whose finding is to be compulsory and whose decrees are registered, not by the judgment of the jurors after due deliberation and upon the weight of the evidence, but rather by the dictates of a party which has suppressed fair and candid discussion, and has by its predetermined course not only blotted out opposition to its party dictations, but has been willing to avail itself of the fruit of its wrongful doings in order that it may retain the ascendency in a Government which would cast it aside if its ballot-boxes were not closed with dishonor and locked with fraud.

Is there a single individual in this land so deluded as to believe that if every ballot-box was open and free and fair and every man permitted to cast his ballot into the box and have it honestly counted out just as he put it in the people of this country would indorse the doctrine of free trade and would permit the Democratic party to continue in power after the 4th of March next?

Is there any one so ignorant that he does not know that the Democratic party, if it succeeds at all, must succeed because in a large part of the Union it has long since been determined that the voters of that portion of the country shall not be permitted to make choice between the parties asking for their confidence, and shall not be permitted to put their ballots into the boxes and select their representatives and choose the rulers to whom their delegated powers shall be intrusted?

Is there any one so misinformed as to be of the opinion that the "majority"—that designated portion of our people by whose expressed wish the country and its institutions is to be governed—will be permitted in those Southern States at the coming elections to determine the principles which are to prevail and to select those who are to administer the laws and to enact the legislation of the country?

Is there any one who does not know that in a large portion of the Union the "minority" overawes the "majority," and that the ballot-boxes do not register the will of a majority, but of a dictatorial and arrogant minority who have usurped the power and trampled out the will of the people?

Is there any one so utterly blinded as to believe that the Democratic party is ignorant of this fraud and outrage and intimidation?

Is there any one so foolish as not to know that the Democratic party is ready and willing and content to avail itself of the assistance of this portion of the Union, and is confidently counting upon the unbroken solidity of these Southern States to perpetuate itself in power, and thus become the beneficiary of this open and notorious and infamous assault upon the fundamental principle of our Government?

THE FALSE CRY OF SECTIONALISM.

I know it is considered an act of great temerity if any one refers even in the most casual way to these elections and the frauds and outrages and intimidations of the Southern States. It is regarded as an interference in matters which do not concern him or his, and he is branded as a defamer and looked upon as one who would stir up unnecessary sectional strife.

But those elections do not concern the Southern people alone, they are matters of interest to the people of the whole country.

For if the Democratic party remain in power for another four years it will only be because it is enabled by continued suppression of the will of the people in those States to blot out the will of the majority.

It is folly to raise the cry of sectionalism as against a free ballot, but if only that cry will avail to attain an honest ballot-box and the rights of the people, then let that cry prevail.

MR. GRADY AND THE BLOODY SHIRT.

Mr. Grady, in his Atlanta Constitution, has given us his interpretation of this sectional cry from a Southern standpoint. He says:

Mr. SHERMAN makes bold to say that he will base his candidacy principally on the pledge to secure, if possible, a fair count of the votes in the Southern States. In other words, he raises the bloody shirt, and flaunts its gory folds defiantly at Mr. Blaine and Mr. Foraker.

This, then, is the new definition of the "bloody shirt." One who believes in the freedom and purity of the ballot-box and is not afraid to assert his opinions, and is ready and willing to plead for fair elections and an honest count in every section of the Union, is a disseminator of vicious doctrines, and a calumniator whose actions are to be met with denunciation, and whose arguments are to be treated with derision and contempt, and who is to be branded as a traitor to the peace and good will of the different sections of the Union.

Mr. Grady and his Southern brethren will find that neither denunciation nor attempted intimidation will meet this question, and that neither epithet nor threat will divert the people from an inquiry into the outrages and frauds of these Southern elections, and that there will be no end to this matter until the ballot-boxes of Georgia are as fair as the ballot-boxes of Indiana.

THE ISSUE OF A FAIR COUNT OF THE VOTE WILL BE SQUARELY MET BY SOUTHERN PEOPLE.

But Mr. Grady goes on further to say:

But Mr. SHERMAN has announced a platform entirely satisfactory to the Democratic party. He will be met squarely on the issue he proposes, and the people of this country will once and for all settle it.

The platform "to secure, if possible, a fair count of the votes of the Southern States" announced by Mr. SHERMAN, which Mr. Grady denounces as "waving the bloody shirt," is entirely acceptable to the Democratic party, and "they will meet it squarely, and the people of this country will once and for all settle it."

Settle what? Settle the right of the people of the Southern States to have a fair election and an honest count? Can it be possible that any party in this country can ever be committed to the principle of contending openly against fair elections and honest ballot-boxes? Can it be possible that any party will ever dare in this country to contend for fraud and outrage and suppression of the votes of the people, and go before the country upon such an issue? And yet Mr. Grady is the spokesman of these States, and no one rises up in that section of the country to denounce him. He speaks as one with authority. He lays down the gage of battle, and proclaims himself and his party as openly determined to destroy the doctrine of a fair election and an honest count, and boasts that his "people will once and for all settle it."

Such men have their uses. They go before to point out the way. They are valuable only so far as their folly and indiscretion advertises to the people the dangers to be met and overcome.

Their defiance is simply the arrogant foolishness of the braggart. When the storm comes and the battle rages fiercest these men hunt the holes and hide in the cracks and the crevices until the danger passes over, and then come forth to boast of their prowess or to decry those braver than themselves.

OUTRAGE CAN NOT ALWAYS PREVAIL.

Mr. Grady and his followers will learn that outrage and injustice may prevail for a time, but it is a triumph that can be but temporary; no wrong can be very long lived. An outraged people may submit for a time, but in the end they will burst from the shackles that bind them, and the very oppression that seems to be crushing out their independence will push them to the wall and compel them to assert with irresistible force the manhood that is within.

If you dam up the river of progress
At your peril and cost let it be!
That river must seaward, despite you
'Twill break down your dams and be free!
It will heed not the pitiful barriers
That you in its way have downcast,
For your efforts but add to the torrent
Whose flood must o'erwhelm you at last!

If Mr. Grady clearly states the issue, and the contest is to be made upon free elections and a fair count in the Southern States, it is time the people of this country were advised of the fact so that they may understand the importance of the coming elections, and see to it that right and justice prevail.

THE RIGHT OF THE MAJORITY TO RULE.

One of the fundamental principles of our Government is the right of the majority to rule. So long as the people are assured of the maintenance of that principle, and are with some degree of certainty guaranticd the privilege of assisting in the formation of the laws by which they are to be governed, they will submit themselves to the law, and acknowledge its superiority and give it their obedience.

With patience and forbearance, recognizing the fact that a bad government is better than no government at all, and that good laws badly executed are better than government without laws, they may for a time quietly submit themselves to wrongs and outrages, to laws violated and principles trampled under foot.

They may content themselves to await the slow movement of the wheels of justice rather than with impatient and hasty steps to assert their rights and to demand the privileges acknowledged to be a part of their citizenship.

THE BALLOT THE MEANS BY WHICH TO EXPRESS THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE.

The method pointed out by the Constitution as the manner in which the citizen could with equal power express his opinions and convictions, could choose his rulers, and delegate his authority, and could approve or disapprove of legislative enactments, and could indorse or condemn the execution of laws, and the Executive, was the ballot.

In the hands of the freeman it was intended to be all-powerful, by means of which he could express his will and could direct his delegated authority, and could recall the same or transfer it to others.

In short, the ballot was the one great means provided for the universal expressions of the people's opinions and the registration of the people's commands.

It was to be the one plane of equality upon which every citizen of the Republic could stand equal with his neighbor. It gave to every citizen an equal power to protect the institutions of his country and to defend his personal rights and political liberties.

To rob him of the ballot is to deprive him of the means of making expression of his desires in the matter of government. To prevent the free exercise of it is to deny to him the opportunity of making expression of his will as to the enactment of laws and legislation.

To destroy it is to take from him that equality which enables him to stand as an equal in the component parts which are to form the completed whole of this magnificent temple of liberty. "The right of the majority to rule" was therefore the very corner-stone of the Republic, and the ballot the method adopted by means of which the majority should be determined.

THE REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PARTIES CONTRASTED.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to briefly allude to the history of the two parties now prominently before the people of this country.

In 1860 the Democratic party had been in almost unbroken control of the Government for a quarter of a century. It again came before the people asking for its continued favor and support, and submitted its claims and its records to the people at the ballot-boxes, and the people by the majority pointed out by the Constitution at the ballot-boxes of the land decided against the Democratic party, and determined that it should no longer continue in power, but should hand over the Government to the Republican party.

There was no claim that the elections had not been fair and free; there was no claim that the man chosen by the people to be their chief Executive, a name since become illustrious beyond all other names, Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, was not the choice of a majority of those entitled to exercise the elective franchise.

In the face of such an expression of the people did the Democratic party quietly submit to the rule of the majority? Did they return their delegated authority to the people? By no means; they determined if they could not rule by fair means and by the ballot, they would rule by force of arms, and eleven States of this Union declared themselves in open rebellion against the Government and levied armies and made war for the destruction of that Government whose only crime was the assertion of the constitutional right of the majority to rule, and after four years of contest, unequaled in the world's history, the supremacy of the Government was restored and the unity of the land re-established.

Permit me now to contrast the action of the Democratic party in 1860 with the action of the Republican party in 1884.

For a quarter of a century the Republican party had been in power; it had held the reins and directed the affairs of this great land.

At a national election it submitted its claims for confidence and support to the people at the ballot-boxes, and the people by a majority of those entitled to rule declared that they would no longer confide to its care the affairs of the nation, but would turn over the Government to its political opponent, the Democratic party. It was claimed that the elections were not fair, that the people in a large part of the land had not been permitted to express their opinions and preferences between the parties. That the ballot-boxes of eleven States of this Union had been trampled under foot; that fraud and violence had crushed out the majority, and that a minority had, by reason of its assured supremacy, taken possession of the polls, and that the right of the majority to rule had been denied and overturned. Notwithstanding all this, did the Republican party fly to arms? Did they levy armies? Did they come with bristling bayonets and rebellious banners? Did they march with impending tread to the destruction of that Government whose affairs they were no longer to rule? Did they determine that the end of their party's life should be the end of the Government's existence? By no means; but they quietly submitted themselves to the declaration of the majority as expressed at the ballot-boxes, and without either anarchy or attempted war, surrendered to their more fortunate and successful opponents—the Democratic party—the Government which they had so successfully administered for a quarter of a century, content to appeal from the people back to the people, content to go from the ballot-boxes of 1884 to the ballot-boxes of 1888.

WHICH PARTY DO YOU COMMEND?

I ask you in all candor which of these two parties do you most commend, that party which annunciated the doctrine of rule or ruin and followed the leadership of those who were determined to hold the reins of Government or to destroy that Government, or that party which was content to trust its cause with the people and to abide by the decisions of the people as registered by the majority in the ballot-boxes of the land?

SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

It would seem proper, Mr. Chairman, upon the eve of another national election, to inquire into the condition of the elective franchise in that part of our Government whose ballot-boxes it is claimed do not fairly and honestly register the will of the people, and where it is continually asserted that fraud and violence deprive the citizen of the means and opportunities to give expression to his political preferences and deny him the right to aid in selecting those to whom his political and representative power should be delegated.

THE SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] but a short time since, on the floor of the Senate of the United States, inquired whose business it was. "What business is it of yours?" he said.

He would have us to understand that it is simply a matter which alone concerns the people of Louisiana, where fraud and violence trample the ballot-boxes under foot in that State.

He would have us to believe that the denial of the right of a citizen in Louisiana to exercise his constitutional rights is a matter which can not affect the people of the other portions of the Union. He forgets that the Representatives elected by fraud and violence and intimidation in Louisiana or Georgia are empowered to legislate for every section of the Union, and that the laws enacted by such fraudulently elected Representatives affect every citizen of the Union, whether he lives in Ohio, in Michigan, or Illinois.

He forgets that the electors chosen by reason of unfair and dishonest elections in these States turn the executive department of the Government over to the party which has defended and upheld and excused these frauds.

When Tweed, of infamous memory, was in the midst of his power, and flourishing in dishonesty, he asked, with the same insolence which characterizes the utterance of the Senator from Louisiana, "What are you going to do about it?"

The reply of outraged justice was so earnest, and so speedy, that the broken criminal had neither the sympathy nor the condolence of mankind.

ELECTIONS OF 1884 FRAUDULENT.

It was charged in 1884, and it is charged to-day, that the Presidential election of 1884 would not have resulted in Democratic victory if the people had been permitted to vote, and to have their votes honestly counted. It is charged with equal earnestness that the Democratic party holds power in this House by reason of the most glaring frauds upon the ballot-boxes and the intimidation of those entitled under the laws to exercise the elective franchise.

We have a right to inquire, Mr. Chairman, into the truth or falsity of these charges, and I challenge any gentleman upon the Democratic side of this House to give, if he can, any fair explanation of the glaring discrepancies which everywhere appear in the votes of the Southern States, and by means of which they hold power in this House and control the very Government itself.

SIX STATES COMPARED.

Permit me to present you the votes of six of these States, every one of whom would be Republican, and would send a large Republican representation to this House if their ballot-boxes were free and fair.

Let us take the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Louisiana. In 1880 in these States the population was divided between the white and colored races as follows:

	White.	Colored.
South Carolina	391,105	604,333
Georgia	816,906	725,133
Alabama	662,185	600,103
Mississippi	479,242	650,291
Louisiana	454,954	483,655
North Carolina	867,242	531,277

We see that in the States of South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana the colored race outnumbers the white race by 422,821, while in Georgia and Alabama the white race outnumber the colored race only 153,835. If the colored people were permitted to vote in these States and have their ballots counted it is not presuming too much to say that all of these States would give large Republican majorities, and that instead of sending an unbroken Democratic delegation to this House, a part at least of their Representatives would sit over on the Republican side of this Chamber.

In the five States of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina the votes were divided between the whites and blacks as follows:

States.	White.	Colored.
Alabama	141,461	118,423
Georgia	177,967	143,471
Louisiana	108,810	107,977
Mississippi	108,254	130,278
South Carolina	86,900	118,883

In Louisiana the colored votes about equal the white votes; in Mississippi the colored votes exceed the white 22,024, and in South Carolina 31,983, and yet at the last elections in these three States, with a colored population of 422,871 in excess of the whites, and with 54,007 black voters in excess of the white voters, these States gave Democratic majorities aggregating 95,658.

Is there any gentleman upon that side of the Chamber so bold and defiant as to claim that these elections were free and fair?

ALABAMA.

If we go to Alabama we find that the voters, by race and Congressional districts, according to the last census, were as follows;

District.	White.	Colored.
First	12,031	14,889
Second	13,563	13,812
Third	14,328	17,477
Fourth	6,566	27,178
Fifth	16,552	12,297
Sixth	18,735	11,139
Seventh	28,185	7,679
Eighth	21,431	12,257

The colored voters exceeded the white voters in the First, Second, Third, and Fourth districts, as follows: 2,557 in the First, 349 in the Second, 3,149 in the Third, and 20,612 in the Fourth. And yet at the election of 1886 in the First, Second, and Third districts there was no opposition to the Democratic ticket, and in the Fourth district the Democratic candidate, Mr. DAVIDSON, has a clear majority of 8,868 votes.

It is idle to tell us that the colored men are voting the Democratic ticket, for there were only 4,220 votes cast in the First district, 5,659 in the Second, and 4,660 in the Third; and yet there are in these three districts alone 46,178 colored voters.

GEORGIA.

Go with me to Georgia, that Democratic paradise, where it requires less votes to elect a man to Congress than it requires to elect a justice of the peace in Ohio. Throughout the entire country there are cast in each district, at a Congressional election, an average of about 30,000 votes. There are about the same number of votes in each of the Congressional districts of Georgia, but at the election of October 6, 1886, the votes cast were as follows:

Districts.	Scattering.	Independent.	Republican.	Democratic.
First	17			2,061
Second	7			2,411
Third				1,704
Fourth		330		2,909
Fifth	1			2,999
Sixth	1			1,722
Seventh		1,537		5,043
Eighth			33	2,322
Ninth			27	2,355
Tenth			7	1,944
Total	26	1,867	67	25,470
Grand total				27,430

In the First, Second, Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth districts there was no opposition.

MISSISSIPPI.

Look at Mississippi. In the four districts represented by ALLEN, BARRY, HOOKER, and ANDERSON the total vote cast in 1886 was as follows:

	Votes.
First district, Allen, Democrat, no opposition	3,140
Fourth district, Barry, Democrat, no opposition	3,086
Fifth district, Anderson, Democrat, no opposition	4,316
Seventh district, Hooker, Democrat, no opposition	4,514

It may be observed that while these gentlemen are all Democrats elected without opposition, no Republican is ever returned from any of these Southern States with that euphonius annex, "No opposition."

ALABAMA.

Now go to Alabama.

	Votes.
First district, Jones, Democrat, no opposition	4,236
Second district, Herbert, Democrat, no opposition	5,659
Third district, Oates, Democrat, no opposition	4,662
Fifth district, Cobb, Democrat, no opposition	6,343

DEMOCRATS CONTROL BECAUSE OF THESE FRAUDS.

Could there by any possibility be a more systematic and determined suppression of the votes of any part of the Union? And yet it is by these very votes, which have been literally blotted out, that these gentlemen are enabled to stand here to-day in control of this Chamber and threaten the destruction of that system of protection which has builded up and diversified the industries of this country and enriched it beyond any other nation upon the civilized globe.

While the votes of these Southern States are being suppressed, and one man, by virtue of his living south of Mason and Dixon's line, is enabled by the ballot to wield as much political power as eight or ten men in other portions of the Union, it may be well for us to inquire how long this condition of affairs shall continue?

How long will the people of this country permit themselves to be ruled by fraud and violence? How long will they be content to submit to the rule of the minority? How long will they be willing to see that wise provision upon which our Government, "a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people," was intended to stand for all time, the right of the majority to rule, trampled beneath the feet of contending factions and without apparent hope of its ultimate preservation?

ONE BALLOT SOUTH EQUALS TEN IN THE NORTH.

In the late election in Oregon to select one Representative to the Fifty-first Congress 60,000 voters put their ballots into the boxes and had them counted out. In Mississippi 45,348 elect eight Representatives to this Congress. Dakota, who stands like a young giantess knocking for admission to the sisterhood of States, and whose strength and independence is witnessed by the growth and prosperity of her people, sends to the floor of this Congress one Representative elected by the ballots of 104,811 qualified citizens.

Indiana, without whose aid the Democratic party will be driven from power, sends her Representatives to this floor, elected by votes largely in excess of the entire vote of Georgia. At the election of 1886 there were cast in the—

	Votes.
First district, Mr. Hovey, Republican	35,159
Fourth district, Mr. Holman, Democrat	32,856
Seventh district, Mr. Bynum, Democrat	43,890

In the great State of New York, upon whose chariot wheels the Democratic party is clinging with the departing strength of despair, the election of 1886 showed in the—

	Votes.
First district, Mr. Belmont, Democrat	32,594
Twelfth district, Mr. Cockran, Democrat	26,782
Ninth district, Mr. Cox, Democrat	22,078

In—

Ohio, Mr. Outhwaite, Democrat	39,255
Illinois, Mr. Springer, Democrat	35,242
Pennsylvania, Mr. Scott, Democrat	30,505

And even in—

Texas, Mr. Mills, Democrat	28,497

ONE DEMOCRAT SOUTH EQUALS TEN DEMOCRATS NORTH.

I commend these figures to my Democratic friends for their careful consideration. Not only is the Republican party completely destroyed in these States, but one Democrat in Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana is as powerful as ten Democrats in the North. One Democratic ballot in Georgia is equal to ten Democratic ballots cast in Indiana, Illinois, New York, and Ohio, and greater than fifty in Oregon or Dakota.

In short, it requires about 30,000 votes in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Connecticut to elect one man to Congress, while 27,433 elect ten Representatives in Georgia.

Could anything be more preposterous? Is it possible to present a more outrageous example of the trampling under foot of the rights and liberties of the people? Can any just or plausible excuse be given for such a wholesale destruction of the ballot-boxes of the land?

SENATOR COLQUITT, OF GEORGIA.

Senator COLQUITT, of Georgia, has attempted, in an article in the Forum, to show that there is no suppression of the colored vote in Georgia.

I commend him to the tables of the ten Congressional districts for his careful consideration. It is, however, worthy of note that it is in matters essentially political that the vote of Georgia is so completely and satisfactorily suppressed.

ONLY SUPPRESSED IN POLITICAL ELECTIONS.

In the late contest in that State upon the question of temperance, where the colored men were for once protected in their right to exercise their franchise, in the county of Fulton alone nearly 10,000 votes were cast. At the preceding election for the choosing of Congressional Representatives the eleven counties of the Fifth district, of which Fulton is one, cast only 2,999 votes.

Either there was fraud in the boxes of Fulton, which contained 10,000 votes upon the non-political question of temperance, or some one was deprived of the privilege of voting upon the political question of selecting a Representative in Congress.

It is useless to deny that the colored man is deprived of his vote in those States, and that by reason of this political intimidation and outrage the Democratic party holds power and controls the lower House of Congress and occupies the mansion of the Executive.

GOVERNOR GORDON, OF GEORGIA.

General Gordon, of Georgia, speaking in Cincinnati less than one year ago, said, in referring to the suppression of the colored votes of the South:

Why then do not they (the negroes) vote in national politics? Because they do not want to vote. Many of them have no reasons for voting and many of them if left to their own free choice would vote the Democratic ticket, but they know it is not necessary in Georgia, for there we are all Democrats. The reason that the black men do not vote in national elections is that they have been educated and lost all interest in the party which robbed them of their school fund and would have robbed them of every right they had for the sake of office.

These, then, are the reasons for the admitted failure of the colored people to vote in Southern elections according to General Gordon:

First. They do not want to vote.

Second. They do not vote because they are Democrats down there.

Third. They do not vote because they have been robbed of a school fund by the Republicans.

Although having been robbed of their school fund, they have become so educated and enlightened as to have lost all interest in the Republican party and the country, and therefore do not vote in national elections.

Mr. Chairman, when there shall have been established asylums for incurable idiocy in the State of Georgia it will be fitting that the distinguished gentleman who now poses as the governor of that State, whose concentrated wisdom has thrown such an electric light upon this question of suppression of the colored vote, escape to the mountains, otherwise he may be classed among those wanting in intelligence sufficient to distinguish right from wrong and deficient in that high sense of chivalric honor that would defend at the risk of life and limb the weak and the oppressed.

They do not vote down there, General Gordon says, because they are Democrats and do not want to.

What trash! and yet this man pretends to speak with authority. He is a representative of Georgia and its chief executive, one whose duty it is to see the laws executed and the people defended and protected in all their rights.

The truth is that they do not vote in Georgia because it is much healthier and safer not to vote, and because they can not with freedom and unrestrained vote the ballot of their choice.

GOVERNOR M'ENERY, OF LOUISIANA.

Governor McEnery, of Louisiana, was more frank and outspoken than his neighbor, the governor of Georgia, upon this question, and with Senators EUSTIS and GIBSON in his opening address in the late gubernatorial contest in Louisiana, and in unqualified language, insisted that the supremacy of the white race in Louisiana was impossible unless the colored citizens of the State were denied the civil rights guarantied to them by the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Louisiana. And—

That the country must be given to understand that what has been done must be done again, and that we can not safely permit the colored citizens to enjoy their political rights.

Upon this speech of the governor of Louisiana the New Orleans Picayune, a Democratic paper, thus comments:

The governor's fiercest attack upon General Nicholls was upon the ground that the latter had shown himself too conservative, not sufficiently aggressive. In plain terms, Governor McEnery took the position that the maintenance of the supremacy of the white race in Louisiana is impossible unless colored citizens of the State are denied the enjoyment of the civil rights guarantied to them by the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State. He went into particulars, and told precisely how the thing was done. The country is given to understand that what has been done must be done again; that we can not safely permit the colored citizens of this State to enjoy their political rights. That argument was distinctly and explicitly made against General Nicholls's candidacy—that he could not be relied upon to secure the supremacy of the white race by suppressing the suffrage of the colored people. In other words, they contended that General Nicholls would not be a safe governor because he is not a bulldozer.

That was the gravamen of ther criticism, and they meant nothing else. What are we to think of the desperation of an office-seeker who has thus supplied every enemy and detractor of the South in the North with such a rich store of campaign material? Hitherto when Republicans have ventured to charge the things yesterday openly confessed by the governor of this State and a United States Senator from this State, Democrats both North and South have denounced the accusation as false, have upbraided those who uttered it as stirring up sectional and race strife, and for "waving the bloody shirt," but now the governor of a Southern State himself waves the bloody shirt, and the United States Senator from Louisiana also waves the garment. When hereafter we undertake to refute the charge of our enemies, how can we meet the confessions of our professed friends?

If any one will carefully examine the election returns of any of these Southern States, he will be enabled to convince himself without much effort that there is a systematic and continued and intentional suppression of the colored votes in the South; and that, as Governor McEnery says, it is necessary in order that the Democratic party shall by this means retain the ascendency in that portion of the Union, and by so retaining it continue in power in this House and in the Presidency.

GOVERNOR M'ENERY AT SHREVEPORT.

I can not dismiss this subject without giving you the plain-spoken utterances of Governor McEenery in his speech at Shreveport, La., March 15 last. Governor McEnery said:

I tell you there is danger, and North Louisiana will have to save this State from disgrace. If you permit the negroes to organize you will have to break it by power, and go right now and break it in its incipiency. Before I will see such another state of affairs I will wrap the State in revolution from the Gulf to the Arkansas line. The white people under the radical régime were fast going towards the condition of Hayti, and I now ask you to establish to the world that we, the white people, intend to rule the destinies of this country. We have now a Gaul at our doors, and it is time we shall say that the law shall be silent, and uphold our liberties at all hazards.

Governor McEnery was followed by Colonel Jack, of Natchitoches, who said:

"You have heard the assurances of our chief executive, that come what will or may, he will wrap this State in revolution, from the Arkansas line to the Gulf, rather than have radicalism come into power. And I tell you we are in danger, with the astute and wily Warmoth as a leader—the wily, crafty, and insidious gentleman from New Orleans.

"If this state of affairs should confront him, all Governor McEnery would have to do would be to issue his fiat or manifesto, and the people of North Louisiana would come to his rescue and redeem the State as they did before; and if what I say is treason let them make the most of it."

McEnery and Jack made similar, but more extreme speeches at Monroe and Tallulah, and McEnery has followed it up in other speeches throughout the State.

Not satisfied with this, he has written to his returning officers, whose duty it is to fix the polling places, appoint the commissioners and clerks of election, and return the votes in all of the parishes of the State, as follows:

"Warmoth is developing too much strength. We must beat him. See to it that your parish returns a large Democratic majority."

Is it possible to state the issue more distinctly than the Governor of Louisiana and his friend state it in Louisiana? Can there by any mistake about this matter? Was it not an open, notorious, and admitted suppression of the colored votes of that State which was determined upon by the chief executive of that State and the Democratic party which supported and indorsed him, and was not the result of the election which almost immediately followed a proof positive of the carrying out of the expressed intentions of suppressing and destroying this vote?

Can even a Democrat of the North, who seems to be struck with a peculiar color-blindness upon this subject of the votes of the South, deny after such an open proclamation and an equally open redemption of the promise, that the colored voters of Louisiana were denied not only the right to organize as well as the right to vote, but that as Governor McEnery had said it should be, "the law was silent?"

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF COLORED RACE GAVE THEM THE POWER.

The enfranchisement of the colored people added to the power of the Southern States twenty-two Representatives and forty-four votes in the electoral college. By this very power based upon these new colored voters they are enabled to control the Presidency and this House; without them they would be in a hopeless minority.

We have a right, therefore, to demand that they be permitted to exercise the right which they have been granted by the amendment to the Constitution, and be permitted without fear or favor to put their ballots into the box and have them honestly counted out.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN ELECTIONS COMPARED.

Permit me to present you a table prepared for the purpose of showing the population, the number of qualified voters, and number of votes cast in some of the States of the Union in 1884, and I have purposely selected these States as nearly equal in population as possible.

The number of population is obtained from the census of 1880, and the votes are those cast in the Presidential election of 1884.

States.	Population.	Number voters.	Number votes cast in 1884.	Per cent. voting.
Alabama	1,262,505	259,884	153,489	59.0
Mississippi	1,131,597	238,532	120,019	50.3
New Jersey	1,131,116	300,065	261,537	87.3
Indiana	1,978,301	498,437	494,793	99.3
Iowa	1,624,615	416,658	375,969	90.2
Georgia	1,842,180	321,438	143,543	44.6
Kansas	995,577	265,714	265,843	100.0
South Carolina	996,096	205,783	91,578	44.0
Louisiana	939,946	216,787	109,234	50.0
Maryland	934,943	232,106	186,019	80.0

In the Democratic State of New Jersey, with a population of 1,131,116, in the Presidential election of 1884, 260,537 voters cast their ballots into the boxes and had them counted out. In the Democratic State of Mississippi, with a population of 1,131,597, slightly exceeding the population of New Jersey, 120,019 votes only were cast or counted. The inference is irresistable—either the Democrats of New Jersey fraudulently stuffed the ballot-boxes or the Democrats of Mississippi robbed them or prevented those entitled to vote from putting their ballots into the boxes.

Democratic Indiana, with a population of 1,978,301 and 498,437 voters, cast 494,793 votes, or 99.3 per cent of the entire vote. Democratic Georgia, with a population of 1,542,180 and 321,438 voters, cast only 145,543 votes, or 44 per cent. of the entire vote. Republican Kansas, with a population of 995,577 cast, in 1884, 265,843 votes, while Democratic South Carolina, with a population of 996,096, cast at the same election 91,578 votes.

FRAUD IN THE NORTH OR FRAUD IN THE SOUTH.

It requires no great amount of wisdom to deduce the conclusion that the Republicans of Kansas and the Democrats of Indiana are fraudulently stuffing the ballot-boxes of these two States or that the Democrats of Georgia and the Democrats of South Carolina are robbing the ballot-boxes of these two Democratic States, or by fraud, violence, and intimidation are preventing more than 300,000 of the legally qualified voters from exercising the right of franchise guarantied to them by the Constitution.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS COMPARED.

If these returns show such gross and glaring irregularities at a general national election, as is exhibited by the returns of 1884, what must we say when we examine and compare the returns of 1886 in the election of Representatives to the Fiftieth Congress?

The States of Kansas, Mississippi, New Jersey, and South Carolina are each entitled to seven Representatives in the Lower House of Congress upon the basis of population as determined by the census of 1880.

The seven districts of Kansas at the election of 1886 returned their Representatives, and their voters registered and had counted in the seven districts of Kansas 277,365 votes, as follows:

First district	31,287
Second district	34,702
Third district	36,716
Fourth district	38,084
Fifth district	35,996
Sixth district	39,025
Seventh district	61,465
Total	277,365

In the seven districts of New Jersey in 1886 there were cast 229,373 votes, as follows:

First district	35,433
Second district	35,380
Third district	33,479
Fourth district	26,021
Fifth district	29,538
Sixth district	37,971
Seventh district	31,551
Total	229,373

In Mississippi, in the seven Congressional districts, the entire vote cast was only 45,348, as follows:

First district	3,167
Second district	11,234
Third district	6,900
Fourth district	3,086
Fifth district	4,316
Sixth district	12,117
Seventh district	4,508
Total	45,348

In South Carolina the returns of seven districts in 1886 showed the following as the total vote:

First district	3,317
Second district	5,235
Third district	4,409
Fourth district	4,470
Fifth district	4,701
Sixth district	4,469
Seventh district	12,476
Total	39,077

Thus we see these four States electing seven Representatives each upon a basis of population determined by the census of 1880. In Kansas 277,365 voters are registered to go to the ballot-box and deposit their ballots; in New Jersey 229,373; while in Mississippi 45,348, and in South Carolina 39,077 are sufficient to return Representatives equal to the Representatives of Kansas and New Jersey.

Thus we see New Jersey and Kansas returning fourteen Representatives to the Fiftieth Congress and casting a combined vote of 506,738, while South Carolina and Mississippi return fourteen Representatives to the same Congress and cast 84,425 votes.

There is manifest inequality in the numbers required to elect in these four States. Either the census returns have not been fairly and justly made with a view to securing equal representation or the voters in Mississippi and South Carolina have not been permitted to cast their votes into the boxes and have them counted out.

But if these figures are astonishing and alarming, what shall we say when we come to examine the returns of the State of Georgia?

Georgia, with a population of 1,542,180 and with 321,438 voters, black and white, and a Congressional representation of ten members upon this floor; and yet at the Congressional election of 1886 the ten districts of Georgia, out of an entire voting population of 321,438, cast only 27,520 votes, as follows:

GEORGIA.

	Votes.
First district	2,078
Second district	2,411
Third district	1,704
Fourth district	3,239
Fifth district	2,999
Sixth district	1,722
Seventh district	6,689
Eighth district	2,377
Ninth district	2,366
Tenth district	1,941
Total	27,520

IS THE COLORED VOTE SUPPRESSED?

Can it be possible that there is no suppression of the colored vote, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] attempts to persuade us there is none in his article in the Forum? Can it be possible that the colored people are voting the Democratic ticket, as Governor Gordon, of Georgia, tells us in his speech in Ohio?

But there are in Georgia 143,471 colored voters alone, and there are 177,967 white voters. If the colored people are voting the Democratic ticket in Georgia, the only ticket recognized and permitted to be voted at all in nine districts of Georgia, where do the white people vote? If of the 147,000 colored people entitled to put their votes into the boxes in Georgia only 27,520 are permitted to exercise the right of franchise, where are the other 120,000 colored voters and the 177,000 white voters permitted to put their ballots?

Is not the Senator from Georgia presuming upon the want of intelligence of his readers, and does not the governor of Georgia presume too much upon the ignorance and credulity of his hearers?

OTHER STATES COMPARED.

It is fair to compare this vote with the votes of the other States. Iowa elects eleven Representatives to this House, and in 1886 her eleven districts cast 346,698 votes.

Connecticut sends four Representatives to this House, three of them Democratic and one Republican, and casts 123,015 votes.

Democratic Delaware, with a population of 146,698 people—a population a little more than the colored vote of Georgia and less than its white vote—sends her one Democratic Representative with 22,230 votes, almost equal to the entire vote of the ten districts of Georgia.

Indiana sends thirteen Representatives to this House, six of them Democratic and seven Republican, and casts in her thirteen districts 459,319 votes, as follows:

	Votes.
First district, Hovey (Republican)	35,150
Second district, O'Neall (Democrat)	30,941
Third district, Howard (Democrat)	29,026
Fourth district, Holman (Democrat)	30,796
Fifth district, Matson (Democrat)	32,856
Sixth district, Browne (Republican)	32,650
Seventh district, Bynum (Democrat)	43,890
Eighth district, Johnston (Republican)	40,728
Ninth district, Cheadle (Republican)	41,458
Tenth district, Owen (Republican)	34,185
Eleventh district, Steele (Republican)	38,899
Twelfth district, White (Republican)	34,478
Thirteenth district, Shively (Democrat)	37,192

ONE DEMOCRAT IN GEORGIA EQUALS TWENTY-FIVE DEMOCRATS IN INDIANA.

Every Democrat in Indiana, except one, is elected by a vote that exceeds the entire vote of the ten districts of Georgia.

Mr. BYNUM, Democrat, is elected by a vote that almost equals the entire vote of Mississippi and is nearly double the entire vote of Georgia.

I call the attention of Mr. HOLMAN, the great objector, to the fact that the vote which elects him to this Congress exceeds the vote of the entire Georgia delegation, and yet we have heard no word of protest from him.

GREATEST OUTRAGE OF ALL.

One thousand seven hundred and four votes elect Mr. CRISP, Democrat, to this floor from Georgia, while 43,890 votes elect Mr. BYNUM, Democrat, from Indiana; in other words, it would seem as if one Democrat in Georgia is as powerful at the ballot-box as twenty-five Democrats in Indiana.

And, as if to emphasize the infamy of this glaring and almost unspeakable outrage upon the ballot-boxes of the land, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, who comes here after having suppressed almost the entire voting population of his own district, is, by the Democratic Speaker of this House, placed at the head of the Committee on Elections, to sit upon the election and qualification of every other member of this House. Could the irony of infamy and outrage go further than this?

REPUBLICANS DISBAND IN MISSISSIPPI.

In Mississippi, with an almost overwhelming majority for the Republican ticket if the people were permitted to register their votes and have them honestly counted, with 130,000 colored voters and 108,000 white voters, and yet so persistent has been the suppression of the right of suffrage that in 1885 the Republican party, as a party, was substantially disbanded, and by formal action, as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., September 10, 1885.

The Republican State executive committee met here to-day. Chairman John R. Lynch presided. The following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That in view of the fact that organized opposition to the Democratic party of this State this fall is useless, because of the well-known impossibility of securing at the polls an honest election, it is the sense of this committee that no convention be called to nominate a State ticket.

What comment is needed upon a statement like that made by one of the great parties of the country in one of the States of the Union?

It is useless to insist that the elections are free and fair.

REPUBLICANS DISAPPEAR IN GEORGIA.

There were cast at the Congressional election of 1880, in Georgia, 55,724 Republican votes. In the election of 1886 there were cast 2,895 Republican votes.

Well did the gentleman from Georgia say the other day that the Republican party had disappeared, and he might have added that there had disappeared with it free and fair elections, and an untrammeled ballot-box.

THE LESSON OF THE HOUR.

We may learn from our adversary, and if we fail to gather wisdom from the lesson of the hour we may blame only ourselves if, after being forewarned, we do not so defend our institutions as to preserve them, and while we are contending for freedom and purity of the ballot-box, let us not be forgetful of the dangers which threaten the liberties of the people.

If these Southern elections have proven anything they have demonstrated that by fraud and violence a factious minority may possess itself of the power and control of the Government itself. To what extent that fraud and outrage has progressed let the history of these elections for the past ten years answer:

This House handed over to the Democratic party by the elections in the Southern States.

The Chief Magistracy of the nation surrendered to the Democratic party because the voters of a large portion of the Union are denied the right to exercise the franchise granted them by the Constitution.

The very men who but a short time since contended for the destruction of the Government are now its recognized rulers, placed in power, not by the people, but by the suppression of the people.

I permit one of them to speak for himself and for them, and I simply quote from what he says. Ex-Rebel General Bradley Johnson, on the 6th of last month, in a speech at Baltimore, said:

I did not believe the United States had a right to coerce the Southern people. I said I would fight if they tried to do it, and I did fight. I would do the same thing to-morrow, as God is my witness.

Many of us might have kept out of that war, but we did not. * * * The South is progressing. She is not dead. These old Confederate soldiers and their descendants elect ninety out of every one hundred Congressmen, thirty-four United States Senators, and the President of the United States. [Applause.] The Government of the United States is controlled by Confederate soldiers.

What comment is needed upon this declaration? If Grady, of Atlanta, thinks that the demand for free and fair elections means the waving of the Union bloody shirt, would it be unfair to suggest that this unreconstructed Confederate is waving the Confederate shirt; or, worse yet, that he is telling the truth and giving the people of this Union the true condition of affairs? I can add nothing to such a statement; it speaks as neither word nor act of mine can speak. But I beg of my Democratic friends to consider its words of boasting, and I appeal to my countrymen to weigh the words and to profit by the lesson it should teach.

REPUBLICANS BELIEVE IN FREE ELECTIONS.

The Republican party believes in free and fair elections. You can point to no part of the Union where the Republican party is in control that the ballot-boxes are not free and fair.

There is no section of the land where the Republican party is in power that deprives any man of a right to vote. There is not a voting precinct in all America where Republicans control that the humblest Democrat can not go peacefully and without question and put his ballot into the box and have it counted just as he cast it. It is a matter of just pride with the Republican party that it wins success by fair and honest elections or it does not win at all. It can afford to be defeated by fraud, but it can not afford to succeed by dishonest elections.

GRANT AS A REPUBLICAN.

I can not refrain from quoting from the speech of that great American, one whose name and fame are illustrious beyond the soldier of any age, and whose wise statesmanship and sagacity and prudence stamped him as a leader among leaders and a statesman among statesmen. General Grant, in his speech at Warren, Ohio, in 1880, said:

I am a Republican as the two great political parties are now divided, because the Republican party is a national party, seeking the greatest good for the greatest number of citizens. There is not a precinct in this vast nation where a Democrat can not cast his ballot and have it counted as cast. No matter what the prominence of the opposite party, he can proclaim his political opinions, even if he is only one among a thousand, without fear and without persecution on account of his opinions. There are fourteen States and localities in some other States where Republicans have not this privilege. This is one reason why I am a Republican.

The history of the Republican party has been one inseparably connected with the purity and the integrity of the ballot. It stands to-day as it has ever stood, a defender of the rights of the people, and it challenges its adversary to a fair and free contest before the court of public opinion. It neither seeks to hide its records nor to destroy its history. It throws down the gage of battle boldly announcing its opinions and convictions, and is ready to defend them upon every occasion and to champion them upon every field. Ever ready to submit to the majority, it only asks that that majority may be permitted without fear and without favor to register its convictions and to express through the ballot the judgment and the will of the American people.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SAWYER, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. PENINGTON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HATCH, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BLAND, from night sessions, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ROGERS, for the remainder of the day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. DUNN, from the session this evening, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CANDLER, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCSHANE, until the 14th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEPHENSON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

The hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, under its previous order, took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 12, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session for the consideration of pension bills upon which the previous question is pending, with the understanding that there shall be fifteen minutes' debate on each side and the right to amend in certain ones. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Strickland, formerly colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The Clerk read the following amendment, proposed by the committee:

In lines 7 and 8 strike out "and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 a month" and insert "and for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, and for no other purpose, said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, 1863."

The Clerk also read the following amendment, proposed by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"For the purpose of prosecuting a claim to date from the passage of this act for a pension, and for no other purpose, Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, from the 30th day of January, 1863."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I merely wish to state in opening this discussion that the report of the committee and the evidence here show the regiment never was entitled to a colonel. There never were enough men to entitle the regiment to a colonel. The evidence also shows that this man never was in command of the regiment as colonel. It shows the further fact that when there were enough men to entitle the regiment to a colonel there was another man mustered as colonel of the regiment. Now, with this statement of facts as shown by the report it seems to be plain that the bill should not pass. I reserve the rest of my time until gentlemen who are in favor of the passage of the bill shall give some reason why it should pass.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what time the gentleman has.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House fifteen minutes debate will be allowed on each side. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] to control the time in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, it is very true that this man was not mustered. It is very true that he was not with the regiment. Why? Because after he had authority to raise the regiment, after he had worked for months raising the regiment, had spent his time and his money, he was stricken down with disease. The report clearly shows that fact, and the gentleman I presume has it before him. It was no fault of Colonel Strickland that he was not mustered. He was not in condition to be mustered. He went to Camp Nelson and from there to Lexington, Ky., and Louisville under the treatment of a surgeon who belonged to the Army. The record contains his statement as to the condition of Colonel Strickland.

When the regiment got a sufficient number of men to be organized and to have a colonel mustered, Governor Johnson was anxious to have the regiment organized, and Mr. Strickland was in Kentucky down with disease, not able to be out of his bed, and upon a consolidation of the regiment with some men raised by Mr. Patton, Patton was mustered as colonel of the regiment. Strickland had been recognized for months as the colonel, he had issued orders as colonel, everybody treated him as the colonel of that regiment, but because, by the act of God, he was stricken down and could not be mustered, we are met here by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] with the suggestion that this bill ought not to pass.

That is about all I desire to say until I hear from the gentleman from Indiana. All that this claimant asks is that we shall give him a status so that he can go before the Commissioner of Pensions and prosecute his claim for a pension. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] states the case as he understands it, and I have no doubt that every man in this House, if he would read this report, would be led to the same conclusion which the gentleman has reached. I desire, however, to call the attention of the House to certain facts. This record shows that the Eighth, originally the Fifth, Tennessee Cavalry was to be organized. It takes twelve companies to form a regiment of cavalry. I shall state some facts now which are within my own personal knowledge.

Thomas Capps, of Knoxville, Tenn., and Mr. Strickland, who was colonel only in name, started out to recruit a regiment. They recruited five companies, which entitled them to a lieutenant-colonel under the law. In July, 1863, Thomas Capps was mustered lieutenant-colonel of that regiment, and John Sawyers, of East Tennessee, was mustered as a major, those being all the officers that the regiment was entitled to under the law. Colonel Strickland in his statement says, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] makes the same statement here, that he failed to be mustered because he was stricken down with disease and was confined to his bed at the time. In his statement Colonel Strickland says that on or about the 1st of September he was taken sick with intermittent fever, and that he went to Murfreesborough, clearly leaving the impression that from the time he was taken sick in September, until the ensuing February, when this regiment was consolidated with another, he was confined to the hospital. Now, I hold in my hand a communication from the War Department, written to me at my request, which I wish to read to the House, and which shows that the statement which Colonel Strickland makes, if he intends to convey the idea that he failed to be mustered because he was sick, is not true.

I will read first, however, the report of the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress on this case. It is as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1623) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland, having carefully considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

Mr. Strickland presented his claim to the War Department, and a letter dated July 17, 1882 from William E. Chandler, Acting Secretary of War, says:

"The Department is in receipt of the statement dated the 5th ultimo, left by you, from Jesse H. Strickland, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who sets forth that in January, 1863, he was authorized by the President to recruit, organize, and equip a regiment of cavalry, to be composed of Tennessee and other refugees who were willing to enter the military service of the United States; that he raised the regiment, which was designated the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, and rendered service as its commanding officer and was recognized as such commanding officer, but that he was never mustered into service, and that his frequent appeals for muster in as colonel have been refused.

"He now renews his claim for recognition as colonel.

"In reply I beg to inform you that this case has received due consideration. No facts are presented to affect the decision of the Department of March 23, 1869, which were not before the Department and considered at the time that decision was rendered.

"The request of Mr. Strickland for muster-in must therefore be refused.

"The decision of March 23, 1869, in this case was as follows:

"'The regulations of this Department prohibit the muster into service of a colonel prior to the completion of the regiment for which he has been commissioned.'

"The records show that the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry was not completed and mustered in until February 29, 1864.

"The request of Mr. Strickland, therefore, can not be granted."

J. C. Kelton, Assistant Adjutant-General, in a letter dated March 9, 1886, addressed to the honorable Secretary of War, says:

"January 30, 1863, Mr. J. H. Strickland was authorized to raise a regiment of cavalry in and near East Tennessee. June 30, 1863, four companies (A, B, C, D) were mustered in for the organization (then termed Fifth Tennessee Cavalry, subsequently Eighth Tennessee Cavalry), and on August 14, 1863, an additional company was mustered in.

"September 24 and October 15, 1863, Mr. Strickland applied for muster in as colonel, but pending action on the same his authority to recruit was revoked by Special Orders 458, paragraph 5, dated October 19, 1863, from this office. December 14, 1863, however, the Secretary of War directed rescission of the special orders referred to, 'leaving the question of muster into service to be determined by the rules of the Department,' but it does not appear that action was had thereon.

"The first and only roll upon which his name appears is the field and staff roll of the incomplete Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, dated October 31, 1863, and on that he is reported absent." [As a matter of course he was absent. He never was with the regiment a day in his life.]

"About February, 1864, the regiment was completed by the consolidation with it of the Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, and on April 1, 1864, S. K. N. Patton was mustered into service as its colonel.

"From the foregoing it will be seen that a vacancy for colonel did not exist in and for the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry until February, 1864, and that S. K. N. Patton was mustered in as colonel of the regiment to fill an original vacancy.

"It is proper to add that claims for recognition heretofore presented were denied March 29 and April 10, 1861, by letters from this office, and by the Secretary of War, July 17, 1882."

Your committee, in view of the foregoing statement of facts, do not think such a case is made as justifies a reversal of the decision of the Secretary of War, and therefore, under the rules of the committee, return the bill with the recommendation that it do not pass.

I read now the communication from the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 12, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your personal request of the 9th instant, I have the honor to invite your attention to report No. 1734, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, first session (copy herewith) which embraces the substance of a letter from this office dated March 9, 1886, in the matter of the claim of Jesse H. Strickland for recognition as colonel, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry.

Additional to the information contained therein, it appears from original papers filed in the claim that "Col. J. H. Strickland, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry," was, by special orders dated September 19, 1863, from Camp Nelson, Kentucky, directed to relieve Lieut. Col. R. Charlton Mitchell as commandant of convalescent camp. On September 21, 1863, Mr. Strickland was directed by Brig. Gen. S. S. Fry, commanding Camp Nelson, to proceed to Lexington, Ky., for the purpose of being mustered in, with instructions, if his muster-in could not be accomplished at that place, to go on to Cincinnati, Ohio, for the purpose. September 24, 1863, Mr. Strickland telegraphed this office from Cincinnati for authority to be mustered-in. His telegram was not answered. September 26, 1863, General Fry, Camp Nelson, telegraphed Mr. Strickland as follows: "Can not make Flint muster you. If it can not be done without going to Washington, go and hurry back." October 15 and November 16, 1863, he was in this city, and on those dates he addressed communications to this Department. No reference to the condition of his health is made in any of those communications.

The strength of the companies composing the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry on February 1, 1864 (a date just prior to the consolidation of the Tenth Tennessee Cavalry with the Eighth) was as follows: Company A, 79 enlisted men and 2 commissioned officers; B, 86 enlisted men and 3 commissioned officers; C, 81 enlisted men and 3 commissioned officers; D, 77 enlisted men and 2 commissioned officers, and E, 85 enlisted men and 3 commissioned officers. Aggregate, 13 officers; 408 enlisted men.

Francis W. Strickland was mustered-in as first lieutenant and commissary of subsistence Eighth Tennessee Cavalry (formerly Fifth East Tennessee Cavalry) to date, May 1, 1863.

Roll for July, August, September, and October, 1863 (four months muster and first roll on file) reports him present.

He was discharged the service May 13, 1864, in special orders, Division of the Mississippi, of same date, on account of having been rendered supernumerary by the consolidation of the Eighth and Tenth Tennessee Cavalry.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. C. DRUM,
Adjutant-General.

Hon. J. T. JOHNSTON,
House of Representatives, Washington.

During the reading of the foregoing letter the following proceedings took place:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEARD. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can not be done under the order of the House for this evening session.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are a great many other bills on the Calendar awaiting consideration.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] be permitted to finish his statement of facts for the information of the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It will only take two or three minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it is brief, I have no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

Mr. CHEADLE. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that there will be no objection urged. This is an official communication from the War Department, which fixes the status of this officer, and how can we vote intelligently upon the case unless we have this information?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We know that this man lost his health in raising this regiment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I want to say now——

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I merely want to say——

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. I can probably say all I have to say upon this subject in less than five minutes; I certainly do not require more. As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I gave very careful and conscientious consideration to this case. A bill had passed the Senate pensioning this man at the rate of $30 a month; the Committee on Invalid Pensions felt that the Senate had perhaps gone rather far, and were willing to have the bill amended so as to simply give him a pensionable status, and leave him to prosecute his claim before the Department.

It is in evidence, the proof is indubitable to any one who wishes to view this question fairly, that this man went all over Tennessee at his own expense, paying out his own money, giving his own time while undertaking to organize from the refugees of that State and elsewhere a regiment under the orders of the President of the United States. It is indubitable that he raised, if not an entire regiment nearly an entire regiment, expending his time and money in that work. It is a fact that he became sick while engaged in the performance of this duty, under the authority of the President of the United States. And inasmuch as we have pensioned scores of men who never were mustered into the service because of sickness or some accident that befell them, it is to my mind astonishing that a gentleman who himself served in the Army of the United States should come here to-night and urge that this man's case should be made an exception to the rule which has been established in this House for the last five or six years. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] has himself admitted in the course of his argument that this man was on the field and staff roll; that he was in command of a camp and was marked "absent;" that he was recognized as colonel of that regiment. But because he became sick, because, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] has very properly said, he was visited with a misfortune and could not complete the work which he so patriotically undertook to perform at the request of the President of the United States when the Union Army needed recruits, when the fate of the nation was trembling in the balance, and we needed patriots to help fight the battles of the country——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You do not state the facts correctly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I insist that the gentleman must not interrupt me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. GALLINGER. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is an astonishing fact to me that a man who himself served in the Union Army should come here and say that one who performed this patriotic duty to the country, giving his time and his money, never having received a single cent in return for the service which he rendered to the Government—it is astonishing to me that any man, much less a soldier, should come here and say we should not grant this man the right to go before the Department and prosecute his claim, giving him the title that he earned and which he was recognized as holding while in command of that camp.

If this man be granted the right which this bill proposes to give him, he will still be compelled to prove himself entitled to this pension; he will still be compelled to prove that any disability under which he may labor was incurred in the line of duty in the service of the United States. I say we are doing no injustice to any soldier, no injustice to the Government of the United States in granting this man this right which, in my judgment, belongs to him and ought not to be withheld from him for a single moment. That is all I care to say.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Just one question. I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to say that Strickland was acting under a warrant from the President of the United States. Was it from the President, or was it a recruiting commission from the provisional governor of Tennessee?

Mr. GALLINGER. According to the testimony, it was from the President of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have some feeling in this matter. I have some personal knowledge of this case. Colonel Strickland was engaged in the same business as myself. I met him at Nashville recruiting his regiment—a loyal man in the midst of treason, spending his time and his money in behalf of the Government. He recruited four or five companies. He was stricken down with disease. Here is the evidence of it:

MEDICAL DIRECTOR'S OFFICE,
Louisville, Ky., September 4, 1863.

I certify that I have carefully examined J. H. Strickland, colonel of Eighth East Tennessee Cavalry, and find him suffering from intermittent fever, and he will not be able to rejoin his regiment for duty for some days.

WILLIAM W. GOLDSMITH,
A. A. Surgeon, U. S. A., Member of Board of Examiners.

Here is a second certificate of the same character, dated at Lexington, Ky., September 9, 1863; another is dated at Lexington, Ky., September 17, 1863. Here is still another:

HICKMAN BRIDGE HOSPITAL,
Camp Nelson, Ky., September 19, 1863.

I have carefully examined Colonel Strickland, of Eighth East Tennessee Cavalry, and find him unfit to perform field duties, because of debility following an attack of fever; and in my opinion it will be several weeks before he will be able for the duties of his corps.

A. C. SWARTZWELDER,
Surgeon, United States Volunteers, in charge.

Now, Colonel Strickland had authority from the President to raise regiment. He went to work to do so, and spent his time and his money in that work. By the act of God he was stricken down for weeks and months. While he was in that condition another man was mustered in as colonel of that regiment, and thus Colonel Strickland was deprived of that recognition to which his services entitled him. All he asks is the privilege of going before the Commissioner of Pensions and showing by proof that while in the line of duty as a soldier he incurred disability entitling him to a pension.

The gentleman from Indiana talks about his knowledge of the circumstances of this case. It is not necessary for me to say anything about the trouble that he and Colonel Strickland had. I will only say that this man has been pursued time and again unrelentingly in a manner in which no soldier ought to act toward another. Colonel Strickland did the best he could, as the proof here abundantly shows. He was a stout, hearty man when he was authorized to raise that regiment, and for months afterward while engaged in that service. While performing this duty he was stricken down, as the proof shows beyond any question. Yet the gentleman from Indiana now says that Colonel Strickland was never with the regiment. It is a startling discovery that because, by reason of being stricken down by sickness, a man is unable to leave his room and therefore is not with his regiment, he must not have recognition or be regarded as entitled to a pension if he incurred disability.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for a moment. I know he wants to state the facts correctly in this case. Now, if you will read this communication from the War Department it will show the fact to be true that this man was here in Washington trying to be mustered at the very time he claims that he was stricken down with sickness.

Mr. BUTLER. Here is a statement of the surgeon in charge, showing the fact that this man was sick on the dates mentioned, and stating that he was not in a condition to perform military service. These affidavits and papers which I hold in my hand I will ask to have printed with my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a question? I wish to ask simply if the several certificates from reputable physicians do not show this man was sick and unable to perform military duty—United States surgeons at that?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; and in addition here is proof, not in the record, just come in to-night, from Colonel Reeves, of the Eighth Cavalry, and other officers of the same regiment, all bearing out the same state of facts. Here is testimony of Colonel Kirk, and Colonel Sawyer, lieutenant-colonel of the regiment after Colonel Patton was mustered in, all testifying to the facts sworn to by Colonel Strickland. There can be no proof stronger than that submitted in support of this case, and I appeal to the House to do justice to this man and grant him the relief that is sought for in this bill.

The affidavits referred to by Mr. BUTLER are as follows:

GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City and county of Washington, ss:

On this 25th day of May, A. D. 1886, personally appeared before me Felix A. Reeve, aged forty-nine years, a resident of said city and county, whose post-office address is Washington, D. C., who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows: That he was colonel of the Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry in the late war of the rebellion; that he was appointed colonel by the Secretary of War on the 5th of September, 1862, and was mustered as such by his order on the 16th of September, 1862.

Affiant states that he was appointed and mustered as colonel before he had recruited any men for his regiment; and that several other colonels of loyal Tennessee regiments—Robert K. Byrd, Robert Johnson, and probably others—were appointed, mustered, and drew pay before they enlisted any recruits for their regiments. Affiant, however, refers to the records of the War Department for a fuller statement of the facts.

Affiant further states that he was acquainted with Colonel Strickland in 1862; that for a short while he was connected with his regiment, and was authorized to recruit for it; that as he understands and believes, he afterwards recruited for the Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, and acted as colonel for several months; but as to this affiant's information is hearsay, and he is unable to state positively with regard to Colonel Strickland's connection with said regiment. Affiant further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution.

FELIX A. REEVE.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Shelby, ss:

In the matter of the claim of Jesse H. Strickland, late colonel of the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, now pending in Congress.

On this the 17th day of February, A. D. 1888, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the aforesaid county, duly authorized to administer oaths, John L. Kirk, aged forty-six years, a resident of Moultrie County, Illinois, whose post-office address is Windsor, Shelby County, Illinois, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to the aforesaid case as follows:

That he entered the Fifth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers (afterwards changed to the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry) in the spring of 1863 and was appointed lieutenant in Company D of said regiment, and acted as said lieutenant until the 12th day of August, 1863, and that he was then mustered as captain of Company E of the same regiment, and that Jesse H. Strickland and T. J. Copps was recognized as colonel and lieutenant-colonel during the time that I was with the regiment; and he further declares that he was discharged from said regiment at Nashville, Tenn., on the 3d day of May, 1864, by reason of the consolidation of Eighth and Tenth Tennessee Cavalry.

He further declares that he has no interest in said case and is not concerned in its prosecution.

J. L. KIRK.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Shelby, ss:

Sworn and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I hereby certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, including the no words erased and no words added, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution, and that said affiant is personally known to me and that he is a credible person.

Certificate on file.

AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, County of Grainger, ss:

In the matter of claim of Jesse H. Strickland, late colonel of Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, now pending in Congress.

Personally came before me, a clerk of the circuit court in and for aforesaid county and State, John M. Sawyers, age sixty-two years, resident of the town of Rutledge, county of Grainger, State of Tennessee, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

That he was among the first men who joined the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, and aided in its organization, and was appointed on April 15, 1863, senior major by Jesse H. Strickland, who was colonel of said regiment by appointment of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and that he knows from personal official knowledge that the said Jesse H. Strickland was colonel of the said Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, by appointment, from its first organization in the early part of 1863 to April 15, 1864, when Samuel K. N. Patton was mustered colonel of said regiment during the absence of Colonel Strickland.

When I last saw Colonel Strickland he was sick, but can not state what was the matter with him.

Further, Col. Samuel K. N. Patton was mustered colonel on account of consolidation with the Eighth and Tenth Tennessee Regiments Cavalry.

Further the deponent saith not.

I further declare that I have no interest in said case, and am not concerned in its prosecution.

J. M. SAWYERS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant; and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution.

Witness my hand and official seal this 17th day of February, 1883.

W. H. CADEE,
Clerk of the Circuit Court for Grainger County, Tennessee.

GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
County of Washington, ss:

In the matter of correction of muster in case of Col. J. H. Strickland, formerly colonel commanding Eighth Regiment Tennessee Calvary Volunteers, United States Army.

Personally came before me, a notary public in and for aforesaid county and the District of Columbia, who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

I have been acquainted with Col. J. H. Strickland for about twenty-three years. I was a member of the staff of General H. P. Van Cleve in 1864, at which time I met and became acquainted with said Colonel Strickland. General Van Cleve was then in command of the post of Murfreesborough and the railroad defenses between Nashville and Tullahoma, Tenn., Department of the Cumberland. I saw Colonel Strickland daily for some time at headquarters and other places, where he was understood to be and regarded as colonel of the Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry United States Volunteers, and was then (1864) on recruiting service.

WM. H. H. SHEETS,
Late Captain and A. A. A. G., Staff of Brig. Gen. H. P. Van Cleve, Commanding Post of Murfreesborough, Dept. Cumb.

(Address of affiant at Register's Office, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.)

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant; and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. GENERAL AFFIDAVIT.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
County of Washington, ss:

In the matter of claim for correction of muster claim of Col. J. H. Strickland, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

Personally came before me Francis W. Strickland, a citizen of the town of Brooklyn, county of Kings, State of New York, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows: I was appointed by Col. Jesse H. Strickland, in May, 1863, first lieutenant and commissary and subsistence of the Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, then being recruited and organized and in camp at Camp Nelson, Kentucky. I reported for duty at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, in May, 1863, and was mustered in on Colonel Strickland's letter of appointment, as were all the other officers of the command, and his orders were obeyed as colonel commanding Eighth Regiment, and he was recognized by the general commanding post, S. S. Fry, and others; General A. E. Burnside, then commanding Department of the West, in which department the regiment was doing duty.

He further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution.

FRANCIS W. STRICKLAND,
Late First Lieut. and C. S. Eighth Tenn. Cav. U. S. Vols.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant; and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution; and that said affiant is personally known to me; that he is a creditable person, and so reputed in the community in which he resides.

Witness my hand and official seal this 16th day of February, 1883.

[SEAL.] CHARLES S. BUNDY,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], which has been read.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The question recurring upon the passage of the bill, the question was taken; and there were on a division—ayes 79, noes 37.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, and Mr. BUTLER were appointed tellers.

The House again proceeded to divide.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the House should not conclude the consideration of these bills to-night, would they not come up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the status of these bills is peculiar in this respect: The previous question was ordered at a night session of the House held for the consideration of pension bills, and the bill came up on the day fixed at the night session, and was then, by order of the House, fixed for consideration to-night.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then the bill stands as any other bill; and the previous question being ordered, if a quorum should not be obtained to-night, would not the bill come up to-morrow under the ordinary practice of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks, from the fact that the bill stands under an order with the previous question ordered upon it, to-night being fixed for its consideration, that it would be in the discretion of the House to dispose of it at any future session or make such disposition as the judgment of the House may dictate.

Mr. MATSON. Has the report of the tellers been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

The tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 93.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. DOCKERY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to inquire whether, in the event of a failure to consider the bill now before us, or the other bills that were made a special order for this evening, they would not be unfinished business at the head of the Private Calendar, and subject to consideration on any Friday hereafter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has just made a statement in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]. That, however, would be for the then occupant of the chair to determine.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. It is very evident from the action of some members present to-night that they intend to obstruct business; and I am going to say right here that the only way to get out of this difficulty is to adopt a motion which I shall make that all cases of this character be postponed until the 26th day of July immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to make that motion later on. The pending motion is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana for a call of the House, on which the House is dividing.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 67.

Mr. MATSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, more than one-fifth voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SPINOLA. I rise for the purpose of asking the Speaker to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to call in the straggling members from the lobbies, so as to be sure and get a quorum. There is no question but that a quorum is here.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 106, nays 50, not voting 168; as follows:

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time, before the announcement of the vote, to ask unanimous consent—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pairs.

The following pairs were announced until further notice:

Mr. TILLMAN with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. FITCH.

Mr. BIGGS with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BYNUM with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. MERRIMAN with Mr. SYMES.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. DE LANO.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. PERRY with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. MCCLAMMY with Mr. NICHOLS.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. COGSWELL.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BELDEN.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. BURROWS.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. SCOTT.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. HIESTAND.

Mr. CUMMINGS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. TRACEY with Mr. PLUMB, until the 17th instant.

For this day:

Mr. ROGERS with Mr. CASWELL.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. BARNES with Mr. HERMANN.

Mr. RUSK with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. COMPTON with Mr. BOWEN.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. GAINES.

On this vote:

Mr. COWLES with Mr. FISHER.

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. SIMMONS with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. GUENTHER.

For three days:

Mr. HATCH with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I want to say to the House that I am paired with Mr. BELDEN on political questions, not on general legislative business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A call of the House is ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was lost.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is a motion for a recess in order? If so, I move that the House do now take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that a call of the House having shown the absence of a quorum, a motion for a recess is not in order. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is it in order to ask unanimous consent to suspend further proceedings under this call and unanimous consent to have a roll-call on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it might be in order, by unanimous consent, to dispense with further proceedings under a call of the House; but no business that required a quorum could be transacted, the absence of a quorum having been shown and the point made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called; and the following-named members failed to answer:

Adams,	Cannon,	Goff,	Mahoney,
Allen, Mich.	Caswell,	Granger,	Mansur,

Mr. MATSON. I understand that more than a quorum have answered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum have answered.

Mr. MATSON. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I demand the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] stated in his remarks that while I was in the service I had a personal difficulty with Mr. Strickland. [Cries of "Regular order."] I wish to say that that is not true. I do not know who the gentleman's informant is, but the statement is not true. I was with that regiment from September until it was consolidated, but I never spoke to or saw Mr. Strickland in my life until I met him during the session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and he never was with the regiment for any one to have any quarrel with him there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I was so informed, and I believed it to be the fact. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBER. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana is willing to withdraw his point, and I ask whether it is in order at this time to move to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order for the House to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEBER. Then I make that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope it will be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to—ayes 88, noes 27.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and 33 members voted in favor thereof.

Several MEMBERS. Count the other side.

Upon a count there were—ayes 33, noes 94, and, more than one-fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPINOLA (after the roll-call had been begun). Mr. Speaker, is it in order to have the amendments to the bill read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order pending the roll-call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 53, not voting 169; as follows:

YEAS—102.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, I have voted, but I am paired, and I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. If it breaks a quorum we shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that even with the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] there is not a quorum.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote having been taken by yeas and nays, the Chair is bound to take notice of the fact that there is no quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally. I make that request for this reason. There is a bill on the Calendar that I think is perhaps the strongest one on the Calendar. I make up my judgment on that point because so many gentlemen——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that when the fact of no quorum is disclosed by a yea-and-nay vote nothing is in order but a call of the House or a motion to adjourn or some proceeding to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. If that is the ruling of the Chair, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COCKRAN. Simply to ask for information; in what position that will leave the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the bills will stand in the same position as now. There has been no vote taken to-night ordering the previous question, that having been ordered before, and the Chair is of opinion that they will come up as unfinished business when this class of business is again reached in the House. But those are questions for the then occupant of the chair to determine. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], that the House adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask unanimous consent that these bills be set down for next Thursday evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum being present, it is incompetent for the House to entertain the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARDY. Is it in order for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to submit a request for unanimous consent. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules prescribe that when the absence of a quorum is disclosed only two motions are in order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. C. HERBERT RICHARDSON, D. D., of Washington City, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FARWELL presented a memorial of wool manufacturers and wool dealers of Louisville, Ky., and other places, remonstrating against the passage of the Mills tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TURPIE. I present the petition of William H. Seal and others, residents of Mount Carmel, Ind., praying for the passage of certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law. As a bill covering the amendments here suggested has already passed the Senate, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of John E. Hood and 15 other ex-Union soldiers and sailors, residents of Plymouth, Mich., praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER. I present a preamble and resolutions adopted by U. S. Grant Post, No. 327, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the passage of Senate bill No. 2797, to authorize the President to advance Chief Engineer George Wallace Melville, United States Navy, one grade, etc. I presume the bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I move that the preamble and resolutions be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present a memorial of a large number of woolen manufacturers and wool dealers, citizens of Kentucky, remonstrating against the proposed legislation in the Mills bill in reference to wool and woolens. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of the State Agricultural College of Florida, with reference to the titles to lands in the Arredondo grant of 20,000 acres in which it is interested, the college being located on a part thereof, and praying for the passage of Senate bill 239, in reference thereto, with certain amendments; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of the Saratoga (N. Y.) Monument Association, praying that an appropriation be made for the completion and dedication of the monument commemorating the surrender of General Burgoyne at Saratoga; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PLUMB. Two or three days since I presented the petition of John Cowdon in regard to the Lake Borgne outlet system of improvement of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and tributaries. I now move that the petition be printed as a public document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2680) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1099) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the time for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3168) regulating admissions to the Institution of the Association for Works of Mercy in certain cases, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1950) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of Fort Berthold agency, in Dakota, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. STEWART to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported a substitute therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8183) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

POLICE MATRONS.

Mr. FARWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint three matrons for the police department of the District, at a salary of $600 per annum, as soon as the necessary accommodations may be authorized and provided by Congress, and the work completed.

These police matrons are to search when necessary, examine, and care for the female prisoners who may be taken into custody by the police, and to take charge of lost or abandoned children while detained at a station-house to which a matron may be assigned, under such rules and regulations as the commissioners of the District may from time to time make. No woman is to be appointed a police matron unless suitable for the position and recommended therefor in writing by at least ten women of good standing, residents of the District.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROAD TO BATON ROUGE NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. WALTHALL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5064) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, La., report it without amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to put that bill on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 5064) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3322) to increase the pension of George W. Montgomery; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3323) granting a pension to Florence Reynolds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHANDLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3324) to make the Lake Borgne outlet, to improve the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River from New Orleans, La., to Cairo, Ill., and incidentally to reclaim and protect the valley lands of the Mississippi River and tributaries from overflow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and Tributaries.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 3325) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3326) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Cœur d'Alene tribe of Indians for the purchase and release of a portion of their reservation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that Order of Business 1722, House bill 7749, be now considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are bills in order?

Mr. HALE. Let us get through with the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A request for the regular order is an objection to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave to introduce a bill by request.

The bill (S. 3327) to establish a council of ordnance was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I wish to say that the gentleman who prepared this bill and submitted it to me for introduction is a gentleman of very high attainments in respect to the matters embraced in the bill; but, of course, as I have not had time to study it in detail I make the usual statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. MITCHELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. PAYNE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT WABASHA, MINN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there resolutions, concurrent or otherwise? If there be none, the morning business is concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that Order of Business 1722, House bill 7749, be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7749) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Wabasha, Minn.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the city of Wabasha, in the State of Minnesota, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge for the passage of vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot-passengers, across that part of the Mississippi River east of the main channel of said river, at a point opposite or nearly opposite the said city of Wabasha, and to charge for such use such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That any bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same for the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over railroads or public highways leading to said bridge; and the United States and all companies and individuals shall have the right of way for telegraph, postal-telegraph, and telephone purposes across said bridge.

SEC. 3. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the current at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of war the construction of said bridge shall not be commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction said bridge or any portion thereof may be located.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever the Secretary of War shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME IN INDIANA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask consent that the Senate consider Order of Business 1607. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, which was, in section 3, line 7, after the word "shall," to insert the word "first;" so as to read:

Provided, That the citizens of said county shall first drill a natural gas well or wells on said grounds, of sufficient capacity to furnish gas for heating and lighting said buildings, and shall supply an adequate quantity of such gas free of cost to the Government.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope that amendment may not be agreed to. I do not think it is essential.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEBTEDNESS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senate to consider at this time House bill 4423, Order of Business 1428. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 4423) relating to certain acts of the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the act of the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to create a funded indebtedness of the Territory of New Mexico to pay and discharge certain claims for carpets, furniture, gas fixtures, gas and water, and fuel, and for shelving the vaults and library room, and for insurance and other incidental and contingent expenses, now accrued and to accrue during the ensuing two years," approved February 14, 1887; and the act of the same Legislative Assembly, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of current expenses of the Territory until the tax income shall meet the same," approved February 24, 1887, shall be approved and declared valid acts of the Legislative Assembly, and the Territory shall be bound by their terms, and shall be held to the payment of the respective sums stipulated to be paid in the bonds, the issuance of which is provided in these acts, and in the manner and form therein prescribed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator please explain that bill to the Senate?

Mr. PLATT. We passed an act in 1885, I believe, that no special acts or laws could be passed by a Territorial Legislature for certain purposes mentioned in the act, but that all such laws should be general laws. The Territory of New Mexico has passed an act to provide for finishing up their Territorial capitol and furnishing it, and some matters of that sort, which I do not think interferes with or is prohibited by the act of Congress to which I have referred; but a question has been raised about it, and it is desired to ratify that action of the Legislature. The Territorial act was defective in that it did not provide any means for paying the interest on the bonds which should be issued. This bill remedies that defect. There are about $250,000 of these bonds which have been sold and the interest on which became due the 1st of July. There are no means of paying it. The credit of the Territory suffers and the bondholders have suffered. This is a House bill, and at the request of the Delegate from the Territory and on examination by the committee we thought it ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 1659) to provide for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1129) granting to the Newport and King's Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the Siletz Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 2536) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company the right of way through the Nez Percé Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas;

A bill (S. 2807) to grant to the Puyallup Valley Railway Company a right of way through the Puyallup Indian reservation in Washington Territory, and for other purposes; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 196) declaring the true intent and meaning of the act approved May 28, 1888.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate now resolve itself into open executive session to consider the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the pending treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty (Executive M) between United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I know of no higher duty of American Senators than giving their advice as to the making or rejection of a treaty settling grave questions which have arisen in relation to important rights of the American people. Our advice and consent have been asked by the President to the conclusion of a treaty involving many important questions of a most delicate nature, which have remained unsettled for many years, giving rise to disputes and differences of a grave character, threatening serious complications with one of the great nations of the world, notwithstanding four previous treaties made for the same purpose.

In the case before us we are not only to determine what is best for the American people, but we find this first question involving the determination of what obligations the American people have come under in former treaties and what may therefore be due to public faith solemnly pledged, what is due to an observance of compacts, what is due to that high honor, to that scrupulous compliance with national engagements, which no people can sully or neglect without disgrace and without disaster.

In discharging this high duty there is no room for considerations of a mere partisan character, no place for passion, no rightful opportunity for appeals or arguments founded in error or directed to any other end than the public good.

In their relations with foreign nations the thirty-eight American States are one, the American people are one; their interests, their rights, and their obligations the same. There may be differences of opinion, as there always are, as to particular questions, but these differences should have no relation to party divisions. Foreign nations have no right to participate in our domestic divisions. As to them we all belong to the same party, the party of our country.

The proposed treaty is a substitute for or modification of existing treaty obligations, and this necessitates a comparison of the old and the new. This compels an inquiry—calm, deliberate, and just—into the true force and meaning of both. Thus only can it be known which is the better. Thus only can we make a rational choice.

OPEN SESSIONS.

Mr. President, for the one hundred years of the existence of our Constitution this examination and inquiry have been made under circumstances which allowed the freest interchange of views between members of this body, the fullest discussion and the calmest consideration. Our deliberations were confidential; foreign nations having adverse interests were excluded. They were not allowed to know the arguments, the reasons, the motives which controlled our action.

That the American people, our masters, ought to be allowed to know what their agents, their servants, are doing, and the reasons for their action, may be admitted in a general sense; but it is also true that it is unsafe, unwise to permit foreign nations with whom we are treating to be admitted into our secret councils and thus learn our views, our motives, the arguments and reasons on which we act. They give us no admission to theirs.

Up to this time the American Senate, without complaint from the American people, have denied this privilege to foreign nations, subordinating the lesser right of the people to be present at these deliberations to their greater right, the right to have their business transacted in a manner most advantageous to them, most consonant to their safety and welfare, the right to exclude foreign nations from intrusion into their councils. This view prevailed in the American Senate as to this very treaty up to and on the 14th day of May last. On that day the Senate, by a vote of 41 to 3—the negatives being Senators DAWES, SHERMAN, and TELLER—refused to admit the British Government and all others to our deliberations. On the 22d of the same month the British and all the world were invited to be present by the vote of every Republican Senator but one, Mr. HALE.

I believe, sir, it is an open secret that this change in the attitude of the Senators on the other side, resulting in a consequent change in the uniform practice of the Senate, was brought about by the action of a caucus or conference of Republican Senators from which all the world was excluded. What arguments were urged, what reasons presented, which worked this extraordinary change are unknown to me, unknown to the world. The Republican Senators became in some unknown way, in secret council, from which the American people were excluded, convinced—solemnly convinced—by arguments and on reasoning which they dared not or would not commit to the American people, that secrecy in affairs, secrecy in making treaties, was all wrong; that the universal practice of our fathers on this subject was all wrong. The inconsistency between the methods used and the end attained, the repugnance between the principles of these methods and the principles involved in this end, are so patent that it requires a large share of charity in judging mankind to believe that both are sincere. The result—a declaration that secrecy in deliberations in conducting negotiations with a foreign power is all wrong, the exclusion of that power from our counsels is un-American, is reached in a secret caucus from which the American people themselves are excluded! It is not to be forgotten, however, that this change in regard to secret sessions of the Senate is not by any means the result of a conviction that such secrecy is in general wrong. The change is limited to this very treaty; for since the vote to consider this treaty in open session we have been considering all other executive business in secret, including not only treaties, but matters of nominations to public office, which are purely of domestic concern. Thus we take into our confidence, admit to our secret counsels, Great Britain when we consider matters which seriously affect our relations with that empire, and we exclude from our confidence the American people when considering matters affecting them alone.

Mr. President, this action of the Senate forces me, in stating the convictions I have for favoring the ratification of the treaty, to argue in the hearing of the British people, if they can hear so humble a man as myself, adversely to some of the alleged rights which have been claimed by American diplomatists. Such arguments have already been stigmatized on this floor as "the British side." Whether the denunciation was intended to deter Senators from expressing views favorable to ratification or to destroy their weight when expressed I shall not stop to inquire. If, however, what I or others may say may favor some of the pretensions of Great Britain and be adverse to false claims set up for our own country, and harm comes from the fact that Great Britain has been notified that such views are entertained and such arguments made, that harm results from the action of the majority—the Republican side of this Chamber—and not from the action of my party associates.

The truth is, Mr. President, as I believe, that this debate is not now and never was intended by the other side of the Chamber to be, as the Constitution intends it should be, as the American people have a right to demand that it should be, a fair and honest consideration of the question of ratification or rejection of the treaty. That question has already been settled in a secret caucus of the other side of the Chamber. The treaty has been predestined to rejection, and for reasons unknown to the world; and the open debate we are now having is not for the purpose of settling what we ought to do, but to justify what has been decreed to be done, by arraigning before the American people the President for negligence or indifference to American rights. The discussion therefore before our masters, the people, must take that full and free range which it would have taken before the Senate if sitting in secret and in the confidence that nothing said would ever be made public or reported to Great Britain. For, Mr. President, it would be a great injustice to those who favor ratification, a great wrong to the American people themselves, if we, when thus challenged before our masters and charged with surrendering great and valuable rights belonging to them, are not permitted to show that no such rights exist, that no surrender has been made, and that which the treaty secures us is of great import and advantage to our country.

Mr. President, the issue being between the old and the new, we are forced to consider both the old and the new, and determine between them. In doing this, sir, I shall not fail to recognize to the fullest extent the importance of these fisheries, nor shall I forget the especial rights, interests, and necessities of those of our countrymen who are engaged in taking and curing fish in waters near the British colonies. There is not an American citizen—native or naturalized—who hazards his life in the oftimes perilous business of fishing in these tempestuous waters whose smallest right I would surrender or impair. On the contrary, whatever rights he has I would not only fortify, but would enlarge as far as in my power. I shall attempt no eulogy on the American fishermen; that has been better done by others. I will say this, that I recognize them, every one of them, as my countrymen, engaged under the sanction of public law and treaties in an employment of great importance to the whole country, full of dangers and discomforts, and often unremunerative to the very men whose skill, whose courage, whose self-denial and endurance take these treasures from the seas. If I do not unconsciously stumble, I shall cast my vote on the question of ratification on that side which, being consistent with the faith of public treaties, the sanctity of international compacts, most advances the welfare of these men.

EFFECT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW ON THE SUBJECT.

Mr. President, during the delivery of the very able and very instructive speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] several weeks ago, he was interrupted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], also by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], both of these Senators stating that the claim to these fishery rights was not made under international law, but was based solely upon treaty engagements. That, sir, is not strictly correct. For the treaty of 1783, as well as the convention of 1818, though fully specifying our rights and liberties with respect to the fisheries, yet must be construed according to law and by the law; and that law is the law of nations as it was understood and acted on at that date by the United States and Great Britain, the parties to these international compacts. This position is distinctly taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Sir, if you make a contract with another your rights under it are ascertained and measured by its terms; these terms are what the law says the language used means, and the law so governing is the law recognized as in force at the time and place the contract is made. To know the obligation of a person to pay to you so many dollars you refer to the law fixing and defining what a dollar is, and so of a pound sterling or a franc. To this law you and the other contractor are presumed to have submitted yourselves so far as relates to the interpretation and meaning of the contract. And the law when thus applied enters into and becomes a part of the contract itself.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations distinctly admits this principle; for in many places the claim of the United States to take fish in the "bays" is averred to be a matter to be determined by the public law of nations, asserting that by that law bays over 6 miles wide are public waters, the common property of mankind, and are not subject to the territorial dominion of the country whose shores they indent.

On page 21 the report states:

> The question of the extent of the territorial dominion, as it respects fishing rights in bays more than 6 miles wide indenting the shores of a country must of course be determined by the law and practice of nations as they existed in the year 1818; at which time the committee thinks the 3-miles limit from shores was recognized without regard to large indenting bays, except under very peculiar circumstances, such as the prescriptive exercise of dominion, etc.

And on page 20, speaking of the eleven bays from which by the treaty American fishermen are excluded, the report objects to such exclusion "whilst by the public laws of nations these same waters will be open to the vessels of all other countries than our own" unless they shall renounce their rights in the same. And on page 21, speaking of bays in the British dominions over 6 miles wide, it is stated that—

> It is not thought by the committee to be suitable to the dignity or interests of the United States to renounce the right of its citizens to pursue business in any part of the public waters of the world. Such rights, the committee thinks, should neither be subjects of purchase, sale, barter, or gift.

There are many other expressions of similar import in that paper; so that whatever may be the opinion of the two distinguished Senators alluded to, it is clear that the Committee on Foreign Relations do regard it as important, even essential, in construing our rights under the convention of 1818, to know what the law of nations is in respect to the "bays" named in it, and that they regard that "bays" over 6 miles wide as not included in the renunciation of fishery rights by the United States made in that convention.

THE RENUNCIATION CLAUSE IN CONVENTION OF 1818.

That convention, after stating the waters in which the liberty of fishing is conceded to the United States, contains this language:

> And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and repairing damages, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever, etc.

The position of the opponents of the present treaty is that the word "bays" used in this renunciation means such bays only as by the law of nations as then understood were territorial bays, bays less than 6 miles wide; and it is upon this contention that our fishery rights are sought to be established in bays from which, as the British claim, the convention excludes us.

Without admitting or denying that such result would follow, if by the law of nations, as understood by England and the United States in 1818, "bays" more than 6 miles wide were regarded as public waters, I shall proceed to examine what rights England and the United States for many years, regarded with reference to these fisheries were subject to separate and exclusive national proprietorship.

Mr. President, it must be noted that there is nothing in the convention of 1818 which indicates an intention of the contracting parties to confine the word "bays" as therein used to territorial waters over which the nation whose shores they indent had general municipal jurisdiction. As I understand it the word "bays" as used in the convention is claimed to mean territorial bays, not so much by force of the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed as from the assumption that it is not to be presumed that the United States and Great Britain intended that the former should be excluded from public bays, to which all other nations were admitted. That neither party would desire such a result, so discriminating against the United States, may be admitted; and it may also be admitted that it would require very plain language to indicate such a concession on the part of the United States.

It becomes material, therefore, to inquire into the opinion and practice of both the United States and Great Britain at and before that time, as to the conceded and acknowledged rights of either or both in these fisheries, as to the admission or exclusion of other nations into and from these waters.

THE TREATY OF UTRECHT.

In 1713 a war between England and France was ended by the treaty of Utrecht. That war was waged in both hemispheres, and between the colonies as well as the principal nations themselves. At that time England was owner on this continent of that part of the United States east of the Mississippi, excluding Florida and Louisiana. France owned all now embraced in the Dominion of Canada and the island of Newfoundland. The British American colonies contributed in men and money largely to the success of the British armies on the North American continent, and especially in all the operations against the territory on which these fisheries, in the language of the treaty of Utrecht, "depended." The acquisition of these fisheries was a main object of military movements in Nova Scotia and the adjacent French territory. These operations were successful.

Nova Scotia (then also called Acadia) and Newfoundland also were conquered by the British armies and ceded by the treaty of Utrecht to England.

Article XII of that treaty is in substance as follows:

ART. XII. France cedes to England all Nova Scotia or Acadia, also city of Port Royal, and "all other things which depend on said lands and islands, and the inhabitants of the same are yielded and made over to the Queen of Great Britain and to her crown forever, and the most Christian King doth at present yield and make over all the particulars aforesaid; and that in such ample manner and form that the subjects of the most Christian King shall hereafter be excluded from all kind of fishing in said seas, bays, and other places on the coast of Nova Scotia; that is to say, in those which lie toward the east within 30 leagues, beginning from the island commonly called Sables, inclusively, and thence stretching along towards the southwest."

Article XIII cedes to Great Britain Newfoundland and adjacent islands, and prevents French from fortifying any place in Newfoundland, or erecting any buildings there, besides stages made of boards and huts necessary and usual for drying fish.

"But it shall be allowed" the French "to catch fish and dry them on land in that part, and in that part only, and in no other beside that of the said island of Newfoundland, which stretches from the place called Cape Bona Vista to the northern point of said island, and from thence running down by the western side reaches as far as the place called Point Riche. But the island of Cape Breton, as also all others, both in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, and in the gulf of the same name, shall hereafter belong of right to the French, and the most Christian King shall have all manner of liberty to fortify any place or places there."

A careful study of Article XII of the treaty is of great importance. France makes the cession of Nova Scotia or Acadia to England "with all other things which depend on said land * * * in such ample manner and form," that the French should thereafter be "excluded from all kinds of fishing in said seas, bays, and other places on the coast of Nova Scotia * * * which lie towards the east within 30 leagues (90 miles), beginning from the island commonly called Sable, and thence stretching along towards the southwest."

It is thus seen that in the opinion and practice of England and France, then the two most powerful of all European states, these fisheries "depended" on the adjacent land, in such sense that the nation that owned the land also owned the fisheries, and that this exclusive national ownership of the fisheries extended more than 90 miles from the coast, as Sable Island itself, the starting point, was away out in the open sea, many miles from the mainland.

By the thirteenth article Newfoundland was ceded to England, but certain fishing liberties were "allowed" the French, notwithstanding the cession, on the coasts of that island from Cape Bona Vista on the east around by the north and then down on the west to Point Riche, but in no other part. J. Q. Adams says Spain was by this treaty of Utrecht excluded from fishing in the "neighborhood" of Newfoundland.

Going back to the early part of the eighteenth century, now nearly two hundred years ago, to the first treaty between the great maritime nations of the world in relation to the North American fisheries, we find it distinctly the practice and opinion of these nations that these fisheries "depended" on the mainland, were subject to the owners of the adjacent shores, and that this exclusive ownership extended at least 90 miles from the shore into the open sea. Thus it was in the very inauguration of the practice of nations, under the law of nations, that there was not only no recognition, as to these fishery rights, of the common property of mankind in them as to all seas, bays, or gulfs outside of 3 miles from the shore, but an express repudiation of such right.

TREATY OF PARIS.

Mr. President, following the practice and opinion of nations, invoked by the Committee on Foreign Relations, for the next half century, we come to the next treaty between France and England—the treaty of Paris, in 1763—in which there were stipulations in reference to this fishery. During that half century France had enjoyed fishery rights on the coast of Canada, and such rights as were conceded on the coast of Newfoundland by the treaty of Utrecht. She had also fishery rights in virtue of her ownership of the island of Cape Breton. A main object of the war which was thus ended in 1763, at least in America, was to conquer from France the remainder of the land on which these fisheries "depended"; and in this object the British colonies fully concurred, and to attain it contributed very largely of both blood and treasure. The result was that Canada and Cape Breton were conquered, and by the treaty ceded to England, leaving nothing to France in these parts but two small and rocky islands as a fishing station.

This treaty confirmed the previous cessions of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and ceded Canada and Cape Breton to Great Britain. Again the fisheries were the subject of negotiation and settlement. France was still allowed the liberty of fishing on the coast of Newfoundland, as specified in Article XIII of the treaty of Utrecht; and the treaty proceeded to say, "And his Britannic Majesty consents to leave," yes, "consents to leave" to the French the liberty of fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This was no narrow bay or strait, but a great sea. Yet so firmly was the idea settled in the minds of the statesmen of both nations that all these fisheries "depended" on the adjacent lands and were a part of the property of the owner of these lands, that it was deemed necessary, in order to secure fishing rights to the losing party, when these lands were ceded, that the new owner should contract to "leave" to the other as a part of his old property appendant to the lands ceded, a portion of his ancient right to fish in that great sea—the Gulf of St. Lawrence. But it was left, not as a "right," for that was supposed to be lost with the loss of the adjacent land, but only as a "liberty" or privilege yielded by the gracious consent of the true owner.

But, sir, even this privilege was not left without restriction. It was allowed only "on condition" that the French do not fish but at the distance of 3 leagues—9 miles—from all the coasts belonging to Great Britain, as well the coasts of the islands in the gulf as of the continent. And as to Cape Breton, the condition was that the French do not fish within 15 leagues, or 45 miles, from the coasts of that island. These stipulations in the treaty of Paris were grants of privileges, and grants, too, on condition, grants on condition-subsequent; so that if there should be a violation of this condition by fishing beyond the prescribed limits, the grant was liable at the will of England to forfeiture, and the French subject, by the force of the treaty itself, to be ejected from fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the seas south of Cape Breton forever. As to the fishing adjacent to Nova Scotia, this treaty, at the end of fifty years from the treaty of Utrecht, solemnly and deliberately ratified and confirmed forever the exclusion of the French from fishing within 30 leagues of the coast of that province, commencing at Sable Island, as it was stipulated in the treaty of Utrecht.

Mr. President, to both these treaties we were parties, not merely silent, unwilling, and acquiescent parties, as humble and obedient subjects of the British Crown, but active, aggressive parties, freely spending our money and shedding our blood to drive the French from these fisheries and to acquire them for ourselves in part as members of the British Empire. We had a local autonomy, the power in ourselves, at our will, to raise men and money for this enterprise, and we did raise and spend more than our proportionate share, as John Adams claimed. The advantage thus gained we enjoyed to our great profit; and the principles on which the acquisition was made we sanctioned, solemnly and explicitly sanctioned not only in words, but by a century nearly of active business life and enterprise in strict accord therewith. It is not in our power to-day to deny or repudiate these principles and this conduct. However much we may have changed, if change there has been, in reference to the extent from the shores to which these treaties could rightfully assign exclusive national rights, it is yet true that in 1783, through John Adams, in 1816, through John Quincy Adams, and ever since, and now in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations and in every speech made in support of our alleged rights, it is made prominent as the surest and best foundation for our claim that our right to these fisheries is an ancient one, coming from our participation in those very wars in which these fisheries were conquered from the French. What this claim means in the report of the committee when they at the same time assert that the fisheries in the open seas outside the 3-miles limit and in the great bays over 6 miles wide are and have always been the common property of mankind and can not therefore be the exclusive property of any nation; and at the same time admit that all the other waters inside the 3-miles limit and inside the bays 6 miles and under in width are the exclusive property of Great Britain, I leave to that learned committee to explain. There remains under the theory of the committee nothing on which the claim by conquest can be located, unless perhaps on and along that mathematical line which, without breadth or thickness, marks the 3-miles limit. The value of such a right is respectfully left to the determination of that learned committee.

Mr. President, such was the action and such the attitude in reference to public law, and under public law which the people of Massachusetts and the other colonies, before their independence, assumed when they were British subjects. Now, sir, if it be argued against the plain facts I have stated that the colonies were only a part of a great monarchy, were not possessed of national rights nor clothed with national responsibilities when they thus acted, and were, therefore, not responsible for nor bound by the attitude assumed by England and France as I have stated it, that their position was only of loyal and obedient acquiescence as dutiful subjects of the British Crown, a sufficient answer will be found in what I have stated, showing their free and active participation in these wars and in the fruits of these wars. If further answer is required it is furnished, abundantly furnished, by their subsequent conduct when they were really free and independent States. And here again it will be found that the United States in the most solemn manner affirmed the doctrine of exclusive and separate national right and ownership in these fisheries, not only to the full extent stated in the treaties of Utrecht and Paris, but carrying these principles to their legitimate and logical result, they affirmed this exclusive right to all the fisheries as well on the ocean itself as on all smaller waters.

ACTION OF CONGRESS IN 1776.

I now bring to the attention of the Senate this subsequent conduct, and I aver that it justifies all that I have said.

Mr. President, the first act of our international intercourse—our first actual and practical assertion of the principle asserted in the Declaration of Independence, that the colonies, as free and and independent States, "have full power to contract alliances and establish commerce"—was the appointment of commissioners to make a treaty of alliance with France. John Adams was one of these. In December, 1776, the Continental Congress, in secret session (for they did not, as we now do in reference to this treaty, admit to their confidence in matters of our foreign relations the nations of the world), appointed a committee of five to consider and report a plan for securing foreign assistance in our war for independence. This committee consisted of John Witherspoon, Elbridge Gerry, Richard Henry Lee, Abraham Clarke, and Samuel Adams—three, a majority, from New England, one from New Jersey, and one from Virginia.

This committee, as in fact did the whole Congress, turned their eyes to France for the needed assistance. And considering maturely what it was in their power to give for the needed alliance and assistance, they remembered that this great fishery and the lands on which it "depended" had once been the property of France; that only after two bloody and devastating wars, in which the colonies actively and effectively participated against the country whose assistance they were now seeking, and in favor of that country with which they were now at war, had this great property been wrested from France and conferred on England, leaving to France as a mere liberty, as a mere concession from the liberality and bounty of England, the poor privilege of taking fish in circumscribed limits, and as to the most valuable part, based on a hard condition, that the taking of fish should not be within many leagues of the shores. They remembered, too, that this fishery was then the most valuable in the world, and, on the principles of the treaties of Utrecht and Paris, to which the colonies were parties, as before stated, that it "depended" on—that is, was appendant to the adjacent lands, then belonging wholly to Great Britain, and that if they succeeded in securing their independence and a separation from Great Britain the fishery would be lost to them, unless they secured also a separation from Great Britain of these very lands and their annexation to the United States. So this great committee, whose names I have mentioned, reported a plan to secure French assistance. This plan, after three days' careful and profound consideration, in secret session, by the very Congress which made the Declaration of Independence, and in less than six months thereafter, namely, on the 30th of December, 1776, was adopted without dissent or division.

This plan, among other things, provided as follows:

It "authorized and instructed the commissioners of the United States to France to assure His Most Christian Majesty that should his forces be employed in conjunction with those of the United States to exclude His Britannic Majesty from any share in the cod fishery of America by reducing the islands of Newfoundland and Cape Breton, and should ships of war be furnished when required by the United States to reduce Nova Scotia, the fishing shall be enjoyed equally and in common by" the French and the United States, "to the exclusion of all other nations and people whatever," and half the island of Newfoundland shall be owned by the French: Provided, That "Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, and the remaining part of Newfoundland" shall be annexed to the territory and Government of the United States." (See Secret Journal of Continental Congress, volume 2, page 39.)

Mr. President, I have read this, not as containing anything unknown to persons who have investigated this subject, but only to refresh failing memories, and to place it in contrast with the assertion of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that in the opinion and practice of nations these waters, when over 6 miles wide, were, for the purpose of taking fish, public not national waters—the common property of all the human race, and to show how utterly destitute of substantial proof, how utterly baseless is the charge made by this committee and by others on the other side of the Chamber, that the treaty proposed for our ratification by the President surrenders rights which belong to us under the public law of nations. This act, this solemn and deliberate action of the Congress of 1776, shows beyond controversy or doubt that as to the American fisheries, the American doctrine, having its beginning in 1713, when we were British colonies, and continuing from that time to the birthday of our separate and independent station among the nations of the world, was in every particular the exact reverse of that false and pernicious, that un-American doctrine announced by the Committee on Foreign Relations. That this doctrine thus reaffirmed in the most solemn manner in 1776, continued to be the American doctrine up to the convention of 1818 and later, will be shown hereafter.

Mr. President, the importance of this action of the Congress of 1776 can not be overestimated. The great men of that day did not build wiser than they knew. They, holding fast to just principles suited to American conditions, thought and acted, even in temporary pressing emergencies, on those broad lines of policy and justice essential to the future grandeur of the nation they were founding. In the broad land they inhabited, washed by almost limitless oceans on either shore, with broad gulfs, bays, and seas adjacent to and indenting the land, were also immense lakes, themselves inland seas, and the greatest rivers in the world. All nature's works were on a scale of magnificence and grandeur unknown in civilized Europe. With the certain conviction that they were laying broad and deep the foundations of a republic which would have a continent for its possessions, they were utterly incapable of confining national rights and privileges over waters indenting their shores to those contemptible and Lilliputian inlets which were under 6 miles wide. Already they had claimed and exercised, and we have ever since claimed and exercised, jurisdiction over Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, and Long Island Sound, all of which were much larger than this limit allowed by the committee for jurisdictional waters. Besides all this, as I have clearly shown, they had, in conjunction with Great Britain and France, in the most solemn public acts, consented to the separate national jurisdiction contemplated in the plan I have referred to.

The occasion and the purpose of this assertion of this doctrine as to public and national waters were a guaranty of its integrity and sincerity. It was the first public act taken by them on their entry into the family of nations. It was an assertion of our adherence to the doctrines of public law established by the nations in reference to these waters. The specific purpose was to secure the friendly aid of a sister nation in our struggle for independence. Can it be said that this first entry was in duplicity, falsehood, and dishonor? Can it be charged that this first great act was in violation of that public law which regulates honorable and friendly intercourse among peoples and nations, an attempt to rob not only one nation, but all, of their just and acknowledged right to share in the common property of the human race, the gift of a beneficent God to all his children? Was this, the false and impious act of that body of men, who at that very date had fresh on their lips the declaration that in maintaining the right of their country to a place in the family of nations they committed themselves and their people to the perils and hazards of war, "with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence," whose laws they were consciously violating? Was the price offered to France for assistance—the exclusion of all nations from the fishery—a false pretense, a sham, a counterfeit presentment of a pretended substance? The doctrine announced by the Committee on Foreign Relations makes an affirmative answer to all these questions necessary.

But, sir, this plan so adopted by the Congress of 1776 was carefully prepared by the distinguished patriots and eminent statesmen I have mentioned. When reported to the Congress it was carefully considered for three days and amended so as to read as I have stated it. Every word was carefully scrutinized and weighed, the import and meaning of every sentence thoroughly considered. The whole, as was intended, conveys fully and explicitly the proper idea entertained.

ANALYSIS OF THE PLAN OF 1776.

In this document, so prepared, so designed as the basis of international compact, there is no word wanting to convey the full meaning of its authors, no superfluous word to confuse or mislead. A careful analysis of it is essential to unfold its full significance. Proceeding with this analysis we discover that the plan was—

First. Not only to exclude Great Britain, the common enemy, from the fisheries, but something else. If the exclusion of Great Britain was all it might be said that was no evidence of what the parties thought of the law of nations on the subject, as this exclusion would be but an act of force—of war—a just return to Britain for her former exclusion of the French. So we see—

Second. That the plan was to exclude also "all other nations and people whatever," friends and foes alike, and allies as well.

Third. The method of this universal exclusion is significant. The exclusion was not to be by a mere police of the seas stationing all over the fishing waters armed ships to capture or drive away all intruders, but the exclusion was to be as a matter of right under the law of nations, as had been announced in the treaties of Utrecht and Paris, before referred to. The exclusion was to be accomplished by reducing; that is, conquering from Great Britain, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, and Newfoundland, the land and island on which the fisheries "depended." Who owned these lands owned the fisheries according to the opinion and practice of nations at that time as asserted in this plan.

Fourth. The object and purpose of this exclusion is set forth explicitly and clearly. This object and purpose had no reference to the common good of all mankind, either morally or financially. It was not pretended that the fisheries were an injury to the human race, and ought therefore, like intoxicating drinks, or gaming, or piracy, to be prohibited, exterminated. Oh, no. A more practical end was in view. The purpose was, when all others should be excluded, that then the fishing "should be enjoyed equally and in common" by the United States and France.

Now, Mr. President, if the doctrine announced by the Committee on Foreign Relations be correct, all this plan, so deliberately and solemnly adopted by the Congress of 1776, was a mere attempt to form a conspiracy with France to plunder and rob, not Great Britain alone, but all mankind of their undoubted rights, and then appropriate the plunder to the pious use of a fair and equal division among the conspirators.

It is true, sir, that "cod fishing" alone is mentioned, but the right to exclude from that embraced the right to exclude from all others. It will be noted also that the phrase is "cod fishery of America," not cod fisheries of Newfoundland, or of Nova Scotia, or of Cape Breton, but of America. It was from this that all nations were to be excluded. That this fishery embraced all places then used and known as fisheries, those on the banks of Newfoundland, on the open sea, and everywhere else where codfish were caught in the American seas, is manifest not only from the force of the expression used and from the former conduct of England and France and the United States, but from subsequent acts and declarations, including those of our most distinguished and able statesmen and diplomatists, as I will show hereafter. Certainly, Mr. President, this crushes the assumed verity of the doctrine of the Committee on Foreign Relations that exclusive fishing rights were allowable only in small bays and inlets not over 6 miles wide.

Mr. President, I have been considering what our fathers of 1776 solemnly proposed, and solemnly decided they had a right to do under the public law of nations; in which they affirmed most explicitly, without a doubt as to their meaning, a doctrine in reference to these fishery waters exactly and with pointed directness the reverse in all respects of the positions assumed by the Committee on Foreign Relations—positions which the committee propose, as the organ and instructor of the Senate, for our adoption as a rule of public law, to be binding on the past and in the future, and as good grounds for rejecting a treaty which secures to us in these waters, with an inconsiderable exception, not only all that the false rule of the committee claims for us, but many valuable and important rights and liberties from which we are confessedly excluded by the public law of nations.

TREATY WITH FRANCE IN 1778.

Mr. President, I come now to consider what was really accomplished, what was consummated and agreed to, in the treaty of 1778 with France in relation to the matters contained in this plan, and in strict accord with the principle announced in it.

On the 6th of February, 1778, our commissioners succeeded in making a treaty of alliance with France, and on the same day also concluded a treaty of commerce.

In Article IX of the treaty of commerce there was a mutual covenant that the inhabitants of each country should abstain from fishing "in all places"—not in territorial waters, not in small bays and inlets not over 6 miles wide—but in all places whatever possessed by the other, and that the French should not fish in havens, bays, creeks, roads, or places which the United States should then hold or thereafter hold; and a like covenant on the part of the United States not to fish in all these when held by the French. It was then provided, to secure the exclusion of all nations by each party, that whenever the places of exclusion, as specified in the treaty, should be open to other nations, the same should be open also to French or Americans, as the case might be.

By Article X it is stipulated that the United States, their citizens and inhabitants, shall never disturb the French in the enjoyment of the right of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland—

Nor—

And I quote the language of the treaty—

in the indefinite and exclusive right which belongs to them on that part of the coast of that island assigned to them by the treaty of Utrecht.

The principle on which these stipulations are based can not be mistaken when we consider the opinions of both parties as exhibited in the treaties of Utrecht and Paris, as I have before explained, and the plan adopted by the Congress to secure French assistance, and on which I have just commented. The treaty of 1788 breathes the same spirit and is based on the same principles as these former treaties and as set forth in this plan. What places either party might rightfully hold under the law of nations are such seas as were adjacent to the land held by the party, out into the sea to at least 90 miles, as was stipulated in one of these treaties. Certainly there was no law of nations recognized by either party as confining the provisions of either to the narrow bays and inlets under 6 miles in width which indented its coasts. The stipulation against disturbance by the United States of the French in fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, every one of which was in the open sea, certainly shows that both parties recognized that such fishing rights were not secured to all nations by the public law of nations, for otherwise the insertion of such a guaranty in the treaty would not only have been wholly useless, but an insult to the United States in the supposition, on which the stipulation was in that view based, that such a guaranty was necessary to prevent the United States from violating the natural rights of France secured to her by the law of nations.

The stipulation not to disturb the French in their exclusive and indefinite right to fish on the coast of Newfoundland, as designed by the treaty of Utrecht, is of itself a plain recognition of this exclusive right, which being indefinite, as stated in the treaty, was not restricted by the 3-miles limit from the shores, as the committee insists all exclusive rights are. Moreover, the stipulation that each party would refrain from fishing in places held by the other, if intended to be confined to within 3 miles of the shore, and to bays and inlets not exceeding 6 miles in width, is utterly absurd and useless, if it be true, as asserted by the committee, that both parties and all nations recognized, as a rule of public law, by which nations are governed, that such waters are territorial, and as such are held as exclusive rights without stipulation or agreement with other nations.

Mr. President, these last unilateral stipulations in favor of French rights in the exclusive fishery on the coasts of Newfoundland and rights on the banks of Newfoundland, without corresponding and mutual stipulations in favor of the right of the United States to fish on these banks, were doubtless introduced at the instance of France because of her exclusion by the treaties of Utrecht and Paris from that immense portion of the high seas lying within 90 miles of Sable Island, which included some of those banks, and to protect her exclusive, indefinite right to fish on the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. President, we have seen from this review of solemn treaties made between England and France and between France and the United States, and the solemn declarations and actions of the Continental Congress, that from 1713 to 1778—sixty-five years—by the common consent of these nations (and of Spain, as stated by J. Q. Adams) that this idea of the Committee on Foreign Relations that all sea waters, including bays more than 6 miles wide, were public fishing waters common to all nations, never had any existence as applied, at least, to the North American fisheries, which from the beginning were treated and held by these great nations as capable of and subject to the exclusive dominion of the nation who held the adjacent shores, and this, too, not only in bays and other inlets of the coasts, but on gulfs, great arms of the sea, and even on the ocean itself.

We come now, Mr. President, to the treaty of 1782-'83, five years later than the treaty with France just alluded to.

This treaty was the second solemn public act of the United States in the shape of a treaty which had reference to the fishery. We had made two other treaties besides those with France prior to the treaty of 1783, to wit, with the Netherlands and with Sweden. These two were treaties of commerce and amity, and embraced many and voluminous provisions; but in neither was a single reference to these fisheries, showing by this omission conclusively that the United States claimed, and these countries conceded, that they had no fishery rights whatever in the American seas. In 1795 like treaties were made with Prussia and Spain, and there was in these likewise no reference to the fisheries.

The fishery article in the provisional treaty with Great Britain of 1782 is copied into the definitive treaty of 1783—the permanent and final one.

Up to this time we have abundant and satisfactory evidence of the position of both England and the United States, and of France as well, as to the extent of national ownership of these fisheries, all agreeing, all asserting in treaties and in the most solemn public acts that they were—all of them—not in small bays and creeks alone, but on the high seas, the subject of exclusive national ownership.

It had not entered the head of an American statesman or diplomatist that the mere acquisition of their independence by the United States, their admission into the family of nations, gave them or their citizens the right of fishery on the northeast coast of North America, in common with the rest of mankind, in what is by the Committee on Foreign Relations denominated as public waters, beyond the ordinary territorial jurisdiction of the state owning the adjacent shores. The fisheries were then universally regarded, certainly by England, France, Spain, and the United States, as appendant to the lands and islands about the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and as much the subject of national ownership as these lands and islands themselves.

The proof of this is absolutely conclusive, notwithstanding the assertion of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the contrary. In addition to the proof I have introduced, I feel bound to introduce more.

where the inhabitants of both countries used any time heretofore to fish, and

The gravity of the present situation, the high character and the great and varied and extensive knowledge of the members of that committee making the contrary assertion constitute the excuse for longer detention of the Senate in furnishing further proof on a proposition already abundantly established.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to ask the Senator from Mississippi with reference to the fisheries on the Grand Banks (without going into the question between bays 6 miles wide and bays 10 miles wide) whether, taking the fisheries on the Grand Banks, it was attempted in former times to appropriate those fisheries to the private use of a particular nation, or to the joint use of certain nations against the rest of mankind?

Mr. GEORGE. That does not seem to be a question, but a statement.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will not find that I violate his indulgence. I understand the Senator as applying the Grand Banks to the fisheries of the ocean in the neighborhood of the coast. Is the Senator aware that any nation to-day, anywhere, asserts an exclusive right to the ocean fisheries on the Grand Banks against any other nation?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not. If the Senator will pay attention to what I am saying he will find that my position can not be mistaken.

And now, Mr. President, following the plan I have adopted, of discussing these grave and important matters by reference to solemn public acts of nations in their chronological order, as near as may be, I come to consider what were the opinions of the statesmen of the United States on the law and practice of nations in reference to the fisheries at the very dates of the provisional treaty and the definitive treaty with Great Britain in 1782 and 1783. I might rely with confidence on the presumption that these opinions, expressed in treaties, expressed in the most solemn and deliberate acts of the Continental Congress, and promulgated and acted on by England, France, and Spain, remained unchanged for the very short period intervening their date and the date of the provincial treaty of 1783.

I say I might safely rely on the presumption that these opinions and principles were unchanged, since at that early day, in that proud era of American statesmanship, profound convictions long entertained were not changed with the suddenness of the conversion of St. Paul or the almost equally sudden conversion, for political and party purposes merely, of the majority in this Chamber as to the necessity of secret and confidential sessions, as I have before stated.

But there is no necessity to resort to presumption. The evidence is full and complete, and needs but to be stated to convince the Senate how utterly untenable is the position of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It will be well, Mr. President, before proceeding further, to recall at this place to the attention of the Senate the exact position of the committee on this subject—that all waters not inclosed in shores 6 miles apart and under are public seas, a part of the property of all mankind, belonging to each nation in common with all others, in virtue of its existence as a free and independent state or community; that the right to take fish in these waters belongs to and inheres in each nation, who has not renounced it, as one of the attributes of its sovereignty and independence; that this same right immediately becomes attached to a new nation on its creation and acknowledgment as a new, free, and independent nation by virtue alone of its sovereignty and independence. This doctrine is certainly true in the abstract so far as it relates to the equal rights of nations, and is undisputed by me as to all real national rights which attach to states and communities which are sovereign and independent.

It therefore follows, Mr. President, that when a new community becomes an independent nation, by virtue of its independence alone, from the mere force and vigor of its independent national life and existence, it becomes clothed with all the rights of other independent nations in what is known as the common property of nations or of mankind. In this I agree with the Committee on Foreign Relations. In fact, there is no dispute between us so far as the principle of the laws of nations is concerned. Our difference is as to its application, as to the test by which, under that law, it is to be determined whether a bay or body of sea water indenting the shores of a single nation is national, or a water belonging to the whole world.

But, Mr. President, whilst these principles I have announced, so far as they relate to the complete admission of a new nation, by the mere fact and as a necessary result of its independence, to all the common and public rights of all nations are not in controversy anywhere, are acknowledged by all as fundamental and invariable and indisputable, it so happens that our statesmen of the Continental Congress did not consider that the acquisition and acknowledgment of the independence of the United States secured to the people of these States fishery rights in these waters as the mere result of their independence. They deemed it necessary that there should be something else done or acknowledged in order to secure these rights. That which they thus deemed necessary to be done or acknowledged was not to be done or acknowledged by all nations, which, on the theory that these waters were common to all nations, was essential, but only by two, France and England, the only two who, according to J. Q. Adams in his letter of January 22, 1816, had fishery rights in these waters. As to France this matter was settled in the treaty of 1778, as I have shown. As to England there had been no settlement. The Continental Congress, as I understand it, had instructed Mr. Adams to conclude no treaty at all with Great Britain without a settlement of the fisheries, and this demand was afterwards limited to the making of no treaty of commerce without such settlement. Mr. Adams, however, acted on the first, and declared to the British commissioners in November, 1782, that he would set his hand to no articles for a treaty, even of peace, without satisfaction as to fisheries.

Great difficulty was found in the negotiations to frame a satisfactory fishery article, and on that account the British commissioner proposed to omit it till the making of the definitive treaty. Whereupon Mr. Adams made the declaration above referred to, and forced a settlement of the fishery question in the provisional treaty itself.

Mr. President, this particular point in our history is so important, even essential to the proper understanding of the subject before the Senate, that it is necessary to treat of it with particularity and care as to the details.

John Adams's diary throws great light on the subject. Still it does not contain such full details as to render it unnecessary to refer to other authoritative documents.

And first it is necessary to ascertain fully and clearly what was then the American claim to the fisheries, its full extent and character. The most valuable document known to me on that subject is the letter of John Q. Adams to Lord Castlereagh, dated January 22, 1816. In that letter Mr. Adams uses the following language:

> The fisheries on the bank of Newfoundland, as well in the open seas as in the neighboring bays, gulfs, and along the coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador, were by the dispensations and laws of nature, in substance, only different parts of one fishery. Those of the open sea were enjoyed, not as a common and universal right of all nations, since the exclusion from them of France and Spain, in whole or in part, had been expressly stipulated by those nations, and no other nation had, in fact, participated in them. It was, with some exceptions, an exclusive possession of the British nation.

Yes, the exclusive possession of the British nation.

This, Mr. President, was the American idea as to this fishery at the date of the treaty of 1783, so stated by the most accomplished diplomatist of this country.

This fishery, as a whole, included the banks of Newfoundland, the open seas, the gulfs and bays and coasts, all these being but parts, as Mr. J. Q. Adams said, of one whole. It included also, as will be seen from the same letter, "drying and curing fish" on the adjacent shores, as "incidental and necessary to the fishery."

With this understanding of the extent and character of the fishery, as well with reference to the high seas as the bays and shores and coasts, all these being but parts of one whole, and with the further understanding that at the date of the treaty the whole was in substance an exclusive British possession, with the exceptions I have before stated (being concessions of Great Britain to France, which, as I have shown, were solemnly recognized and guarantied by the United States in the treaty with France in 1778), it is easy to comprehend fully the meaning of the Continental Congress in the plan adopted on the 30th of December, 1776, which I have before set out—the meaning of the treaties of Utrecht and Paris in 1713 and 1763, and our treaty with France in 1778, as well as the treaty with Great Britain in 1783.

But it will throw more light on this subject to call to mind the claims and arguments of our commissioners who negotiated the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain. They insisted, as is plainly inferable from the propositions of John Adams, that the fishery, including all its parts, on the banks of Newfoundland, in the open seas, in the gulfs and bays and coasts of the British Provinces, and drying and curing, were the common and exclusive property of all the people of the British Empire, except as against France. They further insisted, as J. Q. Adams did in 1816, that as the people of the colonies had contributed their full share, and more than their full share, in blood and treasure in the wars by which these fisheries had been secured to the British people, they, on a separation from the British Crown, were of right entitled to share in them with the British people.

That, sir, was the American doctrine then. There was no pretense or suggestion that the fisheries on the high seas belonged to them in common with the whole of mankind.

It was well understood that the fishery, as J. Q. Adams stated it to be, was an exclusive British possession, with some exceptions which I have shown referred only to the French rights under the treaties of Utrecht and Paris.

In this condition of affairs, with this understanding on the part of the United States, as to rights, or rather the want of rights, in the fisheries under the public law of nations, the negotiations for the treaty were conducted.

On November 4, 1782, just twenty-six days before the signing of the provisional treaty of 1782, which contained the fishery article, as it was copied in the definitive treaty of 1783, John Adams, after having discussed for awhile our fishery rights, drew up his first proposition for the fishery article, which is set out at page 302 of the third volume of his works. That proposition is as follows:

> 4. That the subjects of His Britannic Majesty and the people of the said United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on all the banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and all other places high seas were concerned, was not entertained at all. This is proven is conceded, it means all that it says in relation to all these but where the inhabitants of both countries used any time heretofore to fish, and also to cure and dry their fish on the shores of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, the Isle of Sable, and on the shores of the unsettled bays, harbors, or creeks of Nova Scotia and the Magdalene Islands; and His Britannic Majesty and the said United States will extend equal privilege and hospitality to each other's fishermen as his own. (John Adams's Works, volume 3, page 302.)

Mr. President, this proposition shows fully the American claim. It shows, also, that in the opinion of the United States fishery rights on the high seas, not alone those in narrow bays, 6 miles wide and under, were national, not public, rights, and were capable of being held, owned, and possessed by one or more nations to the exclusion of all others, and were also the subjects of negotiations and compacts between nations to secure exclusive rights therein.

It breathes the same spirit and speaks the same voice as did the plan adopted by the Continental Congress in 1776, and which I have before set out, this spirit and voice being the right of the United States, either by themselves or in conjunction with any other nation, to exclude all the rest of mankind from this fishery as a whole, including that part of it on the high seas—in the ocean itself.

The proposition of Mr. Adams is, in short, to recognize the whole fishery, as well that on the banks of Newfoundland, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and all other places where both parties had used to fish, including drying and curing on the shores of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Sable Island, and on the shores of the unsettled bays, harbors, or creeks of Nova Scotia and the Magdalene Islands, as the ancient and undoubted right of both the people of the United States and of Great Britain, with guaranty that it should continue unmolested. They were to continue to enjoy them unmolested as they had hitherto enjoyed them, and this was without hindrance or molestation from other nations, for all other nations were in fact excluded, except some inconsiderable privileges of France.

In this proposition there is no mention of or reference to fishing rights on the high seas as public rights of all mankind, belonging to all by the law of nations and needing no treaty stipulation to secure them; nor any distinction taken between fishing rights on the high seas and fishing rights on the shores and in the small creeks and bays, including the right of drying and curing fish on land. All these were treated exactly alike and all claimed to stand on exactly the same footing and as parts of one whole.

On 27th November, just three days before signing the treaty, Mr. Adams submitted another proposition, as follows:

ART. III. That the subjects of His Britannic Majesty and the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and all other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and in all other places where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish; and the citizens of the United States shall have liberty to cure and dry their fish on the shores of Cape Sable and of any of the unsettled bays, harbors, or creeks of Nova Scotia, or any of the shores of the Magdalene Islands, and of the Labrador coast; and they shall be permitted in time of peace to hire pieces of land for terms of years of the legal proprietors in any of the dominions of His Majesty whereon to erect necessary stages and buildings and to cure and dry their fish.

This proposition as to the right of taking fish is the same substantially as the first, but as to curing and drying, the word "right" is abandoned and the word "liberty" used in lieu; and there is some change also as to the territory on which drying and curing was to be done, but still the pretension that the American right to fish was as good, as valid in public law in small bays and creeks as on the open sea is maintained. There was no distinction taken between them in any respect whatever.

Mr. President, in further illustration of this subject and as an additional proof of the American claim and of the true meaning of the treaty of 1783, I refer to Mr. Adams's diary of the 29th November, the day before the treaty was signed. It will there be seen that in answer to a proposition of the British commissioner to strike out the word "right" in the first clause of the treaty as it was finally agreed to and now stands, and insert "liberty," Mr. Adams said:

Gentlemen, is there or can there be a clearer right? In former treaties—Utrecht and Paris—France and England have claimed the right and used the word. When God Almighty made the Banks of Newfoundland at 300 leagues distant from the people of America, and at 600 leagues distance from those of France and England, did He not give as good a right to the former as to the latter? If Heaven in the creation gave a right, it is ours at least as much as yours. If occupation, use, and possession give a right, we have it as clearly as you. If war and blood and treasure give a right, ours is as good as yours. We have been constantly fighting in Canada, Cape Breton, and Nova Scotia for the defense of this fishery, and have expended beyond all proportion more than you. If, then, the right can not be denied, why should it not be acknowledged and put out of dispute? Why should we leave room for illiterate fishermen to wrangle and chicane?

Mr. President, here, if at all, was the place for Mr. Adams to claim the right on the ground that it was a right under the public law of nations, of which no nation could be deprived without its consent; for it will be noted that as the article had been then framed and as it now stands the word "right" applies only to fishing in the open seas—bays, large or small, not even being mentioned, they being embodied in a succeeding clause, in which the "liberty" to fish is conceded; yet he said nothing about this public right to which the committee attach so importance. He asserted the American right to be good and valid as compared with the English and French right, and on the further exclusive ground of having contributed blood and treasure to acquire it.

As further proof that in these negotiations no distinction was taken as to fishery rights on the high seas and the same rights on the shores and small bays I refer again to Mr. Adams's diary, in which he states his reasons for asking the British commissioner to strike from the treaty a provision prohibiting the Americans from fishing within 3 leagues—leagues, not miles—of all the British coasts except Cape Breton, and as to that the prohibition was 15 leagues. None of these reasons raise the question of public rights under the law of nations, which, if such a right was then considered as existing, would have been conclusive. They all refer to mere matters of expediency, and among them to the disadvantages which would accrue to the British themselves from the exclusion of Americans; another being "that if forced off 3 leagues we would smuggle eternally;" and that both British and American fisherman would smuggle, especially the American. (See Adams's Works, volume 3, page 338.) Another reason was that the Americans were already excluded indefinitely from fishing on the western coast of Newfoundland in favor of the French by the true construction of the treaty of Utrecht, and that this proposed exclusion would operate to the advantage of France and not of Great Britain, urging as a reason for liberality on the part of England that the Americans would spend their money made in the fisheries in England and the French would not.

Mr. Adams succeeded on these grounds in striking out the proposed exclusion, never once urging our right under the law of nations. In fact, Mr. Adams would not and could not have urged such a proposition, for he was forbidden to do so by the very instructions from the Continental Congress under which he was acting. These directed him not to consent to any treaty of commerce with Great Britain without an explicit stipulation on her part, not to disturb or molest the inhabitants of the United States in taking fish on the banks of Newfoundland and other fisheries on the American seas anywhere, except within the distance of 3 leagues from the shore, if a nearer distance could not be obtained by negotiation. Our demand was to fish within 3 leagues, not 3 miles of the shore. Were the men of the Continental Congress destitute of sagacity or courage, as were, in the opinion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the American commissioners in 1818? So again when during the negotiations he was informed by the British commissioner that the French Government proposed that there should be a partition of the fisheries between England, France, and the United States, and that the fishermen of each nation should be confined within the boundaries specified, Mr. Adams did not object to the partition upon the ground that these were public waters in which all nations had a right to fish, and England, France, and the United States could not therefore partition them among themselves but on the ground of expediency alone, stating among other things "that it would be very difficult to restrain our fishermen; they would be frequently transgressing and making disputes and troubles." (See 3 Adams's Works, page 332.)

The treaty between France and England in 1783, made simultaneously with the treaty with us, and the negotiations for which were carried on at the same time, and by frequent interviews between France and the American commissioner, recognizes the same doctrine.

Article V of that treaty is in substance as follows:

ART. V. The French King "in order to prevent quarrels which had hitherto arisen between the two nations," France and England, "consents to renounce the right of fishing which belongs to him," under Article XIII "of treaty of Utrecht, from Cape Bona Vista to Cape St. John," on the east coast of Newfoundland "in 50° north latitude," and the British King "consents on his part that the fishing assigned" to the French, "beginning at Cape St. John, passing to the north and then descending by the western coast" of Newfoundland "shall extend • • • to Cape Ray, situated in 47° 50' latitude. The French shall enjoy the fishing which is assigned to them as they had a right to enjoy that assigned to them by the treaty of Utrecht."

A declaration was appended to the treaty which required England to take the most positive measures to prevent her fishermen interrupting the French fishermen through competition, and to that end England promised to pull down the erections for fishing and to remove them. The French were not to be incommoded in cutting wood necessary for repairs of scaffolds, huts, and fishing vessels.

What a pity, Mr. President, that John Adams and his compatriots had not the "sagacity" to see the great light which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has discovered—that fishing in all these waters, seas, bays, and inlets, up to within 3 miles of the shore, was the common right of all nations, or seeing it, had not the courage to recognize it and be guided by it. If this great light was a true light, not the mere fitful glimmering of the jack-o'-lanterns of politics, the exhalation of the swamps and quagmires of partisan prejudice, it would only have been necessary to call attention to it to secure all and more than all the mere fishery rights which the instructions of the Continental Congress demanded.

Mr. President, all this proves, if anything can be proven by human evidence, that from the year 1713 up to and including the year 1783 when was concluded the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States by which our independence was acknowledged, in the opinion and practice of England and France and of the people of the United States this fishery was held and treated as one, whether on the high seas, on gulfs and bays, or on shores, including drying and curing, and that it was appendant to these British provinces and was the subject of national exclusive ownership in all its parts and was partitioned among these nations by treaties among themselves alone, and that the idea that it was a public right of all nations, even so far as the before mentioned, also the right to cure and dry fish on the shores, and about rights or the seas in which they existed. It left those rights in high seas were concerned, was not entertained at all. This is proven beyond all controversy when we consider that if this fishery right on the high seas was a public right there was no necessity for saying anything about it in the treaty of 1783, for on that view it would have resulted to us as a necessary sequence of our independence. J. Q. Adams's evidence on this subject is conclusive. In his letter to Lord Castlereagh, date 22d January, 1816, before alluded to, Mr. Adams said:

> If the United States would have been entitled in virtue of a recognized independence to enjoy the fisheries to which the word "rights" is applied, no article upon the subject would have been necessary in the treaty. (Fourth American State papers, page 358.)
> It was precisely because they might have lost their portion of this great national property, to the acquisition of which they had contributed more than their share, unless a formal article of the treaty should secure it to them, that the article was introduced. (Ib., page 359.)
> That Great Britain would not have acknowledged these rights as belonging to the United States in virtue of their independence is evident, for in the cession of Nova Scotia by France to Great Britain by the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht it was expressly stipulated, as a consequence of that cession, French subjects should be henceforth "excluded from all kind of fishing in the said seas and bays, and other places on the coasts of Nova Scotia, that is to say, on those which lie toward the east within 30 leagues, beginning from the island commonly called Sable, inclusively, and thence stretching along towards the southwest.
> The same exclusion was repeated in the treaty of peace in 1763; and in the eighteenth article of the same treaty Spain explicitly renounces all pretensions to the right of fishing "in the neighborhood of the island of Newfoundland." It was not, therefore, as a necessary result of their independence that Great Britain recognized the right of the people of the United States to fish on the Banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places on the sea "where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time theretofore to fish." (Ib., 358.)

These extracts utterly overthrow the position of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It must not be forgotten that the above extracts from Mr. Adams were written by him in reply to an argument of Lord Bathurst in defending his position, that the "liberty of fishing," mentioned in the treaty of 1783, had been abrogated by the war of 1812, and was to be distinguished from the "right" to fish in public waters; Lord Bathurst's position on this exact point, to wit, that fishing on the open sea, was a public right, being precisely the position of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, it will not now be a matter of difficulty to ascertain the meaning of the word "bay," as used in the treaty of 1783. It is now rendered certain that at that date, 1783, both England and the United States considered, that as to this fishery, in all its parts on the high seas, and on bays great and small, there was no distinction as to any of them as to the right to own it as a whole, as the property of a single nation; that in practice exclusive rights were secured on the high seas and in the small bays, equally, and the exclusive liberty to fish was equally extended to these bays and to the high seas more than 90 miles from the coast.

Then it follows that no reason existed, no motive felt, why, in using the word "bays," it should be presumed that only small bays were intended.

In all the treaties theretofore made, in all the correspondence, in all the negotiations leading to, and concluding these treaties, not a single word was used which indicated that as to this fishery there was a distinction between small bays and large bays, or that the exclusive right of fishing was limited to 3 marine miles from the shore. But, on the contrary, this distinction now set up was wholly unknown and unthought of; and when reference was made to rights or exclusion of rights of fishing, as to distance from shore, 3 leagues, 15 leagues, and 30 leagues were named, and not 3 miles, as the committee insists is correct.

We are left, then, to give to this word, as well as to all others used in the treaty, its natural signification. This signification is evident. It indicates all the bays of his Britannic Majesty's dominions (excluding specially some of those of Newfoundland), every water known as a bay, whether large or small. There is nothing in the language used which restricts the word to any particular kind of bay situated in the British dominions. If a particular piece of water was a bay in any sense and known as a bay it was included, if only it was a bay of "his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America." That was the phrase which distinguished and separated them from all others; there was no separation of those bays one from another. Hence, under the treaty of 1783, which conceded to us fishery rights, and this is not denied by any one, the United States had the liberty to take fish in all the bays, whether great or small; and also to cure and dry fish on all unsettled bays, whether great or small.

Mr. President, I call especial attention to the fact that if in the treaty of 1783 "bays" means only small bays—6 miles and under in width—there is no grant or concession in that agreement of the right or liberty of taking fish in the larger bays at all, and no right or liberty to take or cure fish on the unsettled large bays. And thus this manifest absurdity would come from this view: that whilst the treaty specifies with particularity the places in which the Americans have a right to fish, namely, Banks of Newfoundland, Gulf of St. Lawrence, and all other places "in the sea" in which both parties had before used to fish, and then specifies coasts, "bays," and creeks, in which the liberty to fish is conceded, it means all that it says in relation to all these but "bays." As to these, without any reason therefor, we are excluded from all but the small bays, which in many instances excludes us from fishing in the very waters of the large bays over which we are compelled to sail in order to enjoy our fishing rights in the smaller bays. This would seem to be conclusive.

But if it is insisted that this absurdity is removed by claiming the right to fish in the large bays, under that clause acknowledging the right "in all other places in the sea" where both countries had theretofore used to fish, the answer is overwhelming.

In the first place, it has been seen that John Adams, in his first proposition, before set out, drew the fishing article by naming the places for the fishing rights, as "all the banks of Newfoundland, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and all other places" (not in the sea, but all places whatsoever) where both countries had used to fish, and he repeated this phrase in his second proposition. He omitted all mention of bays, creeks, and even seas in reference to taking fish. If that language had been adopted, the right to fish everywhere in seas, bays, and creeks, if they had theretofore been used by both countries for that purpose, would have been conceded, as is now contended for. But this language, though twice proposed, was twice rejected, and the phrase he used was amended by inserting "in the seas" after "all other places," confining the places to "seas" so far as the "right" was recognized, and then afterwards naming "bays," especially in which a "liberty," not a right, was conceded. The treaty was fully and deliberately considered and discussed for many weeks. Every word of importance in it underwent careful scrutiny, as was the manifest duty of negotiators in framing so important a compact. The language proposed by Mr. Adams, having clearly and manifestly the meaning now set up, was rejected, and rejected, too, on account of that meaning, and other language inserted, which by common understanding and the right use of language does not have this meaning; and the proposition now is to reject this ordinary meaning, and not only that, but to insert in its stead the substance of the language which was twice deliberately rejected.

To do this would be to destroy the confidence of mankind in the integrity of language itself, and to leave them, as to the meaning of solemn agreements respecting the most important rights, to conjecture—to the whims and conceits, the speculations, the "airy nothings" of persons charged with enforcing them.

"Gulfs," "seas," "bays," "harbors," and "creeks" are all mentioned in the treaty. Each of these words has its own appropriate meaning, and its distinct and separate meaning also, when they are all used together. Words which have a specific and also a general meaning when used in an instrument in connection with other words which, of themselves, include all that is embraced in the general meaning, have only in that instrument their specific meaning. Thus sea has for its specific meaning, the second order, next to oceans, of the great bodies of salt water. But it also includes, in a more general sense, smaller bodies of water which are parts of it. It is manifest, if these smaller parts be expressly named also, as gulfs, bays, and creeks, that then the word "sea" can only be applied to waters which are specifically the "sea," and not to gulfs and bays and creeks; for otherwise these words would add nothing to the instrument. They would be meaningless. It is an established canon of interpretation, as well as of common sense, that in such cases the words used have as their appropriate meaning that specific sense in which they are manifestly used—whereby according to a universal rule on that subject, every word used shall be construed as having force—as having been introduced for some valuable purpose, and not one of them be rejected.

In solemn legal instruments unnecessary words are excluded; unmeaning and useless words are not introduced for euphony or style. Each word has its appropriate office and performs its appropriate duty. Sea, gulf, bay, creek, and harbor are all used in the order in the treaty in which they are named; each may include in a general sense all those which follow. This can never be done when these subordinate waters are themselves specifically named and used for distinctly separate purposes.

This argument itself is conclusive.

Mr. President, I have shown beyond successful controversy that in the treaties between Great Britain and France in 1713 and 1763 these fisheries, whether in small creeks and bays near the shore, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or in the open seas, for distances in some instances 3 leagues or 9 miles, in others 15 leagues or 45 miles, and others 30 leagues or 90 miles and more, and in another for an undefined and indefinite distance, were habitually and constantly treated as the subject of exclusive national rights of the power which held these British provinces, and as "dependent" on these lands, and as being, furthermore, the subject of barter, sale, exchange, and gift.

I have shown that in the opinion and judgment of the United States, commencing with the Continental Congress in 1776 down to the year 1816—without a break in the continuity of this concensus of opinion—the fishery right was, as conceded and acted upon by Great Britain and France, an exclusive national right; and in addition that these countries and our statesmen regarded the fishery in the waters above mentioned and within the distance from the shores above stated to be of such a nature as in all its parts to constitute but one whole, including all the waters a valid compact of the United States; a part of the supreme law of the nature and character of the liberty, but only as to the extent consid-

before mentioned, also the right to cure and dry fish on the shores, and that this right was the subject of exclusive national ownership, to be acquired by possessing the adjacent land, and when so acquired subject to disposition by barter, sale, exchange, or partition, at the will of the nation or nations owning these lands, and for their sole use and proprietorship, excluding all other nations; I have also proven that in the opinion and judgment of the United States these waters—all of them, including the ocean covering the banks of Newfoundland—so far as fishing rights were concerned, were not public waters, as contended for by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in which all nations had a right to participate unless excluded by their own consent; that in their opinion and judgment, at the date of the treaty of 1783 the fishery as a whole, including all its separate parts in the ocean and in the small bays and everywhere else, was the exclusive possession of the British people, with the slight exception granted by Great Britain to France.

It has also been shown that the United States claimed a share in the fishery in all its parts at the date of the treaty of 1783 as a part of their rights, basing their claim expressly on the contribution they had made as a part of the British nation in blood and treasure in acquiring these rights from other nations, as the exclusive possession and property of the British, and expressly repudiating the suggestion that as to that part in the sea and ocean they were entitled, under the law of nations, as independent states.

It has been proven that these views were expressly set forth by the United States in the year 1816, when negotiating for a recognition of these rights in the fishery, and that such was the state of their claim at the very date at which the convention of 1818 was entered into.

Now, sir, it remains only to show that there is nothing in the convention of 1818 to change or modify these views. The task will be an easy one, and when it is accomplished it will appear that, however distasteful the result may be to us, however contrary to our present and recent contentions, construing the treaty of 1783 and convention of 1818 by what was the manifest intention of both parties and in the light of the claims and opinions of both and of the plain language used, that "bays" as used in that convention by us in the renunciation of former liberties, means the same thing exactly as "bays" in the treaty of 1783, by which the renounced rights were in the first instance recognized or acquired. And this appearing, it is shown that the present treaty now under consideration grants very important and valuable rights in the fishery never before belonging to us, and never before, nor even now, conceded by Great Britain to any other nation.

Mr. President, before proceeding to an examination of the text of the convention of 1818 it is proper to call to mind at this point the exact state of the negotiations and the exact differences between Great Britain and the United States as developed by diplomatic correspondence between them in relation to the fisheries.

At the treaty of Ghent in 1814, which ended the war of 1812, it was found there was an irreconcilable difference between the two Governments as to the alleged abrogation of the treaty of 1783 by the late war.

It was contended by Great Britain that the treaty as to the fishery rights was abrogated. On the other hand it was asserted by the United States that the stipulations were of that permanent character respecting permanent national rights that they survived a war between the parties. Lord Bathurst, for the British Government, insisted that so much of the third article of the treaty of 1783 as recognized the right of the United States to fish on the banks of Newfoundland and on the Gulf of St. Lawrence—open seas—was the mere recognition of a right which the United States had by the law of nations, and therefore survived the war. This is the first instance I have noted in which Great Britain made such a concession with reference to this fishery. He further insisted that the liberties to take and cure fish on coasts and bays, etc., were grants, and were therefore abrogated by the war. Mr. Adams, as has been shown, controverted these views, and insisted that our fishery right was clearly a permanent right, and not abrogated by the war on the grounds before stated. There was no question in dispute between them as to the meaning of "bays"—as used in the treaty of 1783—Mr. Adams's claim being equally extensive, whether the one construction or the other was placed on that word.

The sole point in dispute was that the United States affirmed and Great Britain denied that the whole of the fishery article of 1783 was in force. The United States sought a clear recognition of this claim and Great Britian resisted and refused it. Lord Bathurst expressly declaring that Great Britian would never admit that the liberties to take and cure fish in the bays, etc., specified in the treaty of 1783 were rights of the United States. So it turned out that in October, 1818, the convention was signed. As both parties, though for entirely different reasons and on very different grounds, as has been explained, agreed exactly as to the rights eo nomine recognized as belonging to the United States to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and "other places in the sea," the convention was made, as the preamble asserts, to settle the differences between the two Governments as to the "liberty" to take and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His British Majesty's dominions. It said nothing, therefore, about rights or the seas in which they existed. It left those rights in the United States fully and completely and unquestioned. They were treated, as they undoubtedly were, as our undeniable rights, without reference to the question whether they were ours by the law of nations, as Lord Bathurst then and the Committee on Foreign Relations now affirm, or whether our title rested on the treaty of 1783, recognizing our right as coming from a partition of the exclusive right of Great Britain, as Mr. Adams insisted. The convention treated solely of the liberties on the coasts, bays, etc., which Great Britian insisted had been revoked or abrogated by the war, and which the United States contended remained unaffected by the war. On that point the British contention was admitted, or else there would have been no treaty and need for a treaty. The manifest purpose, therefore, of making the treaty was to secure our rights in British waters. The mere authentic diplomatic recognition of the claim was all that under the view of Mr. Adams would have been required. No treaty under that view was required, or even appropriate.

I see nothing in the circumstances of our country at that time which rendered it probable that our statesmen who negotiated and ratified this convention should have been influenced by fear of Great Britain, as alleged by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Four years before we had ended a war with that power in which American valor and American skill in arms had won undying laurels. At the very date of the ratification of the treaty Andrew Jackson, who had punished the British on the plains of Chalmette as they had never been punished before, was a major-general in the United States Army ready again to lead his countrymen to victory in a war with the same nation. Winfield Scott, the victor over the same enemy on bloody fields, was still an American general, and Zachary Taylor—honest, brave old Zachary Taylor—was also an officer of the United States Army. In military genius our leaders were the equals and even the superiors of the British. In the service of the United States, in civil life, were some of the most distinguished names of our history—Henry Clay was Speaker of the House of Representatives and a firm friend and supporter of the Administration; Calhoun, Secretary of War, and the younger Adams the head of the Cabinet. The President had won distinction as a gallant soldier in the War of the Revolution and as a statesman of the highest order attained the highest place in the nation. There still lived of the Revolutionary fathers Jefferson and John Adams. At no time in our history was our country better equipped, for war or peace, in the service of the bravest and wisest. So that this charge of a deliberate surrender of our rights, through want of sagacity and courage, involves national shame and disgrace. Sir, the charge is without foundation. It dishonors the great statesmen of that day—it dishonors the great and brave American people, who, in spite of divisions at home, in spite of Hartford conventions sowing discontent and distrust, had rallied around the national standard, and winning imperishable renown on bloody fields, by their endurance, their valor, their constancy, had achieved an honorable peace.

But, sir, this method of denunciation and abuse is wholly out of place in considering the treaty before us. We can not inject into it rights not in it, by denunciation of its authors, nor cure the surrender of rights, if surrender were made, by falsely attributing to it a meaning it does not possess. If our fathers were cowards in respect of the convention of 1818, it is no reason why we should be false. The convention exists as a part of the supreme law of the land, and it constitutes our title and, according to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], our sole title to these fisheries. What it gives us we have; what it surrendered we have not.

Mr. HOAR. Right there let me ask the Senator, does he say that I said the treaty of 1818 constitutes our sole title?

Mr. GEORGE. That is what I understood the Senator to say in his interruption of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. HOAR. I absolutely and peremptorily disclaim that view of it.

Mr. GEORGE. So if it be mean and cowardly, if it deliberately surrendered fishery rights, as the Senator from Maine insists, it is the greater reason for the negotiation of a new treaty which, like the one before us, surrenders no rights, but secures many and valuable privileges we never before had.

But, sir, my duty now is to ascertain what this convention means, for whatever may be its true meaning, we are bound by it—bound by national good faith, by national honor to abide by it in all its length and breadth, until it shall be abrogated—lawfully and constitutionally abrogated. We can not escape from it by setting up either the plea of cowardice or of folly. I find no proposition in the report of the committee to abrogate it. On the contrary, I find they insist, as I insist, that it shall be observed in good faith by both countries.

Mr. President, I come now to consider more especially the meaning of the text of the convention of 1818, to arrive at which my previous observations have been in the main directed.

I do not propose to praise the convention, nor do I feel at liberty to denounce it, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] did, as the result of a want of "sagacity" and "courage" on the part of our commissioners, and "as a deliberate surrender of our fishery rights." However this may be, it is not denied that it exists to-day as a valid treaty;

erty was held and treated from the beginning up to the year 1818 as the proper subject, under the law of nations, of exclusive rights of indi-committee and their political colleagues on this floor I have no such hope. Very soon after the treaty was sent to us by the President for a valid compact of the United States; a part of the supreme law of the land. I may be pardoned, I hope, in saying that it was negotiated by two of the ablest of American statesmen, Gallatin and Rush, under the Presidency of James Monroe, whilst John Q. Adams was Secretary of State, and Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Wirt were members of the Cabinet. It was also ratified on a yea-and-nay vote, thirty-eight Senators voting for it and not one against it.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of this convention," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas, 38.

Those who voted are—

Barbour, Virginia; Burrill, Rhode Island; Crittenden, Kentucky; Daggett, Connecticut; Dickerson, New Jersey; Eaton, Tennessee; Edwards, Illinois; Eppes, Virginia; Forsyth, Georgia; Fromentine, Louisiana; Gaillard, South Carolina; Goldsborough, Maryland; Hanson, Maryland; Hunter, Rhode Island; Johnson, Louisiana; Rufus, King, New York; Lacock, Pennsylvania; Leake, Mississippi; Macon, North Carolina; Mellen, Massachusetts; Morrow, Ohio; Noble, Indiana; Otis, H. G., Massachusetts; Palmer, Vermont; Roberts, Pennsylvania; Ruggles, Ohio; Sanford, New York; Smith, South Carolina; Stokes, North Carolina; Storer, New Hampshire; Tait, Georgia; Talbot, Kentucky; Thomas, Illinois; Tichenor, Vermont; Van Dyke, Delaware; Williams, Mississippi; Williams, Tennessee; and Wilson, New Jersey.

So it was

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the convention made and concluded at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Thirty-eight Senators voted for it and not one against it. Of the Senators so voting in the affirmative are the illustrious names of Crittenden, of Kentucky; Forsythe, of Georgia; Rufus King, of New York; Harrison G. Otis, of Massachusetts; Macon, of North Carolina; Eppes, of Virginia; Gaillard, of South Carolina, and every Senator present from New England, only one of them being absent. The Senator from Maine very plainly intimates that the treaty as made was the product of fear on our part, for if it was the result of want of courage on the part of the negotiators, and was, as the Senator says, "a deliberate surrender of our fishery rights," the fault was not less in the President and Senate who ratified it than in the commissioners who conducted the negotiations. So the condemnation of the Senator from Maine applies equally to the President and his Cabinet, the Senate, and, in short, the country itself, for after its ratification Mr. Monroe was re-elected almost unanimously. I say to the Senator from Maine:

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona Multi.

Then, what does it mean? That is the important question. Because of the "differences" between the United States and Great Britain respecting the "liberty" (not the right) claimed by the United States to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His British Majesty's dominions in America it was made, as the preamble expressly states. These "differences," as exhibited by the correspondence between Mr. Adams and Lord Bathurst and Lord Castlereagh, before alluded to, did not relate to the extent of this liberty so claimed by the United States, but as to whether it existed in any degree or to any extent whatever. There had been no controversy about "bays," whether greater or less than 6 miles wide. The difference was as to whether the liberty claimed as to any "bay," was well founded. Both parties, at that time, well understood the status of the fishery among nations, both understood that this fishery for nearly a century, in all its parts, on the sea and Gulf of St. Lawrence, as well as on the great bays and small inlets, had been recognized and treated by both, and by France and Spain as the subject of the individual and exclusive ownership of particular nations. And especially was it understood that the United States set up their claim to this liberty upon the ground that the fishery, including all its parts, in waters of whatever nature, of whatever dimension, and also including, as necessary incidents, the right of drying and curing fish on the shore, was before the independence of the colonies the exclusive possession of the British people, with some slight exceptions, as stated by Mr. Adams, and that on the separation they were entitled to a share in them with Great Britain—not with other nations—and that they did in fact secure such share by the treaty of 1783. With these differences as thus explained, the parties proceeded to make a new agreement—the convention of 1818. This convention did not recognize the claim of either party. It did not even propose to compromise the difference.

It proceeded in plain words to declare that the United States "shall have" the liberty of fishing and drying and curing in certain places—"shall have" in the future, not as in the treaty of 1783, when speaking of "rights" acknowledged in that treaty, "shall continue to enjoy unmolested" these rights. On the face of the convention it was a grant in futuro of liberties. When considered, however, as I think is right, with reference to the former treaties and the former acts and conduct of the parties in reference to the matter, it was a partial recognition of the disputed claim of the United States to the extent named; and also, by a subsequent clause, a renunciation by the United States of any claim beyond what is recognized. The convention, however, did contain a new grant with certain restrictions as to the liberty of American fishing vessels to enter for certain specified purposes British waters.

The difference between the treaty of 1783 and the convention of 1818 as to the liberty of taking and drying fish is not in any respect as to the nature and character of the liberty, but only as to the extent considered territorially over which the liberty was to exist thereafter. In some respects this extent was diminished, and in others enlarged, as compared with the treaty of 1783. It was as to taking fish diminished in extent by the limitation that the liberty was not to extend to within 3 marine miles of certain coasts, bays, and harbors of His Majesty's dominions, being all but the southern and western coast of Newfoundland, the shores of Magdalen Islands, and the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador. The diminution as to the curing and drying was in the exclusion of the United States from the coast of Nova Scotia and the Magdalen Islands. The enlargement in fishing was in the liberty to take fish on the southern and western coasts of Newfoundland from Ramea Islands to Quirpon Islands, our rights under the treaty of 1783 being dependent as to Newfoundland on the actual exercise of similar rights by British fishermen, we being excluded where they did not actually fish; and enlarged also in the indefinite extension northward of fishing rights through the Straits of Belle Isle, not to be exercised, however, in contravention of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company.

Those were substantially the changes made in the treaty of 1783 by the convention of 1818.

But it must be borne in mind that as to the question now in dispute about fishing in the bays over 6 miles wide there was no settlement of any difference between the two countries; if any existed no attempt to settle it was made. No difference appears to have existed. The language in the convention of 1818 recognizing the right to fish in bays, harbors, creeks, and the language renouncing the claim of rights to fish in certain bays, harbors, and creeks of his British Majesty's is exactly the same in the convention and in the treaty of 1783. I have shown beyond successful controversy that this language in the treaty of 1783 embraced equally small and large bays, that it gave or conceded the liberty to fish in both without distinction or difference.

It is therefore to be presumed as the convention of 1818 was in pari materia with the treaty of 1783, that the same identical language used in both would have the same meaning in the one as in the other. It must be noted also that the liberty of fishing as conceded in the treaty of 1783, and as also conceded in the convention of 1818 on the coasts, bays, etc., of Labrador is in the same language, and that the renunciation in the convention of 1818 by the United States of the right to take fish on the coasts, harbors, and bays, other than those in which the concession is made, is also in the same language. It follows, therefore, beyond doubt, that, as in the two concessions, "bays" certainly means large as well as small bays, the same word means the same thing in the renunciation. And thus it is shown, beyond honest controversy, that under the renunciation in the convention of 1818 we have lost the liberty of fishing in the large bays over 6 miles wide, unless the English language is of that flexible and dishonest character that, when used by us in treaties, it includes everything possible in grants in our favor, and shrinks to the smallest possible limits in all renunciations we may make. No honest nation, no honest man can stand on a position like that.

Mr. President, I know that further argument on this point is unnecessary, for it is established, if anything can be established by human reason, that in the convention of 1818, as in the treaty of 1783, the word "bays" means waters geographically situated within the British dominions of North America of any and all dimensions, and that, as in the treaty, the liberty to take fish was conceded or acknowledged as to all these bays, so in the convention this same liberty was renounced by us as to all, the concession and the renunciation being exactly the same in extent as to the subject-matter of the concession or renunciation. The Bay of Fundy may be rightfully considered as excluded, because, in fact, it is not a British bay, one of its headlands being on our shores.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GEORGE. I believe I would rather not be interrupted. I want to get through. The Senator will see my views as they are developed and if he wishes to discuss any of these questions with me hereafter, very well.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wanted to ask a question of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi declines to be interrupted.

Mr. GEORGE. It has also been shown that by a universal consensus of opinion and practice between France, England, and the United States, the nations chiefly if not solely interested in the fishery, this great propvention, in that clause of it which concedes the liberty of taking fish on or within 3 marine miles of certain coasts, bays, etc., named in it, contains this proviso:

sion, acts of retaliation, and the last one, it will also be noted, was in no respect contingent but was absolute, excluding from American ports all British vessels from the British colonial ports named in it without

erty was held and treated from the beginning up to the year 1818 as the proper subject, under the law of nations, of exclusive rights of individual nations, and this in all the waters in which the fishery existed, without regard to dimensions, including as well all bays, whether more or less than 6 miles wide, as also the great Gulf of St. Lawrence and the neighboring ocean itself. It has also been shown by the letter of J. Q. Adams I have quoted that at least this opinion was entertained by the United States up to and including negotiations for the convention of 1818. This is sufficient, amply sufficient, to crush forever the suggestion that the plain meaning of the words of the convention of 1818, recognizing all the bays in the British possessions as the proper places in which exclusive rights of one nation to take fish existed, shall be restricted to bays under 6 miles wide.

EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS RECOGNIZED IN CONVENTION OF 1818.

But, sir, strong and conclusive as this is, we have in the very convention itself the recognition of this in the plainest and strongest terms. From this there is no escape by any argument or evasion whatever. This recognition is found in that provision of the convention which concedes to the United States the liberty of taking fish on the coasts, bays, etc., of Southern Labrador through the Straits of Belle Isle indefinitely to the north, but "without prejudice to the exclusive rights"—(I quote the language of the convention)—"without prejudice to the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company."

Now, here "exclusive rights" are not only recognized as being the rights of a nation, but the subject of grant to a corporation of its own creation. And what are the exclusive rights so recognized in the very convention itself? They are defined in the charter granted in the year 1670 which gives to this company (I quote its language) "exclusive right"—"yes, exclusive right—to take fish." Where? In small bays and creeks 6 miles wide? No; but in all those "seas, straits, bays." Yes, "bays," rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds, in whatever latitude they may lie, within the entrance of the straits called "Hudson Straits."

Now, sir, mark the forcible language in which this grant of exclusive rights is made. First, the right is to be "exclusive" of all nations and of all men. It is granted not only on rivers, lakes, creeks, but also in sounds, straits, and bays, and even in seas themselves. Then it is granted in all those great waters, in whatever latitude they may be, if only they lie within the "entrance"—yes, the entrance—"of Hudson Straits." The straits at their entrance are 80 miles wide, their narrowest width anywhere is 60 miles, and the average is 100 miles. The Hudson Bay covers many thousand square miles. But leaving this out we have here a clear grant of an exclusive right to fish in Hudson Straits as they lie within or farther inward than the entrance. What other great waters, bays, and sounds were included in the grant of exclusive rights to the Hudson Bay Company it is unnecessary to ascertain. Certain it is that the grant is of waters, seas, bays, inlets, straits, etc., without reference to their width. This grant was made originally and continued on the principle then recognized both in England and America that sea-fisheries in America were regarded as the rightful subject of individual national exclusive ownership in waters on the northeast of this continent, including bays and seas, without reference to their dimensions. Acting on this conclusion the United States in the convention of 1818 solemnly recognized, in the language I have quoted, this exclusive right of the Hudson Bay Company. And yet, in order to maintain the contention of the Committee on Foreign Relations, we are asked to commit ourselves to the folly of rejecting the plain meaning of language used in the convention of 1818 on the untenable ground that this meaning is so utterly inconsistent with the doctrine and practice of nations, especially of the United States, in respect to exclusive rights in large bays; that it is impossible to believe that we gave our assent to it in that sense, whilst in the same convention there is an express and unequivocal recognition of this condemned doctrine and practice.

Mr. President, certainly what I have stated is a conclusive refutation of the false and un-American doctrine in reference to fishing rights on the northeastern coast of North America announced by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I might well decline further argument on this point in view of this unbroken consensus of opinion based on the practice and usage of nations, including our own country, and sustained by the ablest and most patriotic of American statesmen from the beginning down to the date of the convention of 1818, and solemnly recognized and affirmed in that convention itself. But, sir, there are some errors and fallacies which mankind surrender only after every possible and every imaginary ground for their support have been swept away. There are some follies which, assuming the false shape of benefactions to those who cherish them, become so intertwined with the feelings, the prejudices, and passions of mankind that they are entertained with generous hospitality even after detection. This idea of the Committee on Foreign Relations which I have been considering is one of them. Of course, Mr. President, I have no hope of convincing them; but despite the great authority of that committee, I do hope that the American people will give that just weight to their own history, to the acts and declarations of their most eminent statesmen, which will enable them to see this controversy in its just light. As to that committee and their political colleagues on this floor I have no such hope. Very soon after the treaty was sent to us by the President for our constitutional advice, it was considered in secret by a caucus of the Republican members of this body. It was determined that it should be rejected. They have the power to reject it. The rejection of it is to be an issue in the Presidential campaign. Through and by this rejection it is hoped that enough voters will be seduced into the support of the Republican ticket to reverse the action of the American people in 1884 and to return to coveted power those who had been ejected in that year. So that this fallacy of the committee having been made an issue in the campaign, they will not, they can not, they dare not, be convinced.

Now, Mr. President, while I believe that those who still remain unconvinced will reject any evidence, however conclusive, even though it come from one risen from the dead, yet there remains one other testimony which I believe it my duty to introduce. It is the voice of one who though dead "still lives" in that resurrection which comes from his teachings daily pondered by and daily leading the world. He was an American, and had American prejudices for American interests. On this exact point now in dispute he spoke no uncertain language. He said in the circular issued by him in July, 1852, as Secretary of State, speaking to this very point in issue:

> A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied equally to small and large bodies of water thus situated.

If "bay" has this meaning, as it certainly has, as usually understood, what pretense is left for the contention of the committee? It has been shown, conclusively shown, that there is nothing in the context of the convention, nothing in the law of nations so far as it relates to these fisheries, nothing in the practice and opinions of the United States and Great Britain—parties to the convention—which demands a qualification of this meaning. On the contrary, the practice and usage of these two nations in reference to the subject-matter of the convention were up to its date in exact accord with what its meaning would be if "bays" had this usual and ordinary meaning as stated by Mr. Webster. No reason remains for twisting or changing this meaning.

Now, the convention of 1818 contains an explicit and clear renunciation by the United States of fishery rights in all bays of the British provinces, with certain specific exceptions. It contains more than this. It contains a renunciation of these rights to a line drawn 3 miles from these bays. That, sir, we can claim the right to fish in a bay when we have renounced the right to fish within even 3 miles of it, is a proposition which, in the fair and reasonable opinion and judgment of mankind, it will be impossible to maintain.

Mr. President, I have now said all I desire to say on the true meaning and construction of the convention of 1818. If I have not misread the truths of history; if I have not misinterpreted the acts, the declarations, and opinions of American statesmen, I am authorized to conclude that at the date of this convention, 1818, in the opinion and judgment of those statesmen, there was no rule of the law of nations which as to this fishery confined exclusive national fishery rights to bays and inlets 6 miles wide and under; and hence there is no just ground for giving the word "bays" as used in that convention an unnatural and unusual meaning.

It will not do to say in opposition to the ratification of this treaty, as was said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], that the convention of 1818 surrenders our rights. That, sir, is a greater reason, if it be true, for the acceptance of the treaty before us, which secures to us every important, every material right allowed in that convention, even if construed as the Committee on Foreign Relations construe it, and it surrenders nothing of value. But construing the convention of 1818 as it should be, this treaty gives us many and great advantages not possessed under the convention; and this is also true, however the convention of 1818 may be construed.

It is a fair and just treaty; the best we have ever been able to secure after many years of irritating and harrassing negotiations. Its negotiation reflects credit on American diplomacy, and is another convincing proof that American rights, American honor, American interests, at home and abroad, are safe in the hands of the present Administration. This truth neither party prejudice nor the argument of the Committee on Foreign Relations will be able to obscure.

COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENT OF 1830.

Mr. President, in what I said yesterday there was no allusion to the claims set up by the Committee on Foreign Relations as to commercial rights to our fishing vessels under what is called the arrangement of 1830. The committee admit that no American vessel had a right to resort to British North American ports for any commercial purpose or other purposes, but only to take fish on certain coasts; and that fishing vessels only had also a right to resort to all British North American ports for the special purposes named in the convention of 1818.

There can be no doubt whatever on this subject from the language of the treaty itself, so far as regards fishing vessels; and it is only in relation to fishing vessels that we have any concern now. That con vention, in that clause of it which concedes the liberty of taking fish on or within 3 marine miles of certain coasts, bays, etc., named in it, contains this proviso:

That American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood or obtaining water, and for no other purposes whatever, etc.

Certainly there can be no doubt as to the meaning of this; and so far as I can understand the report of the committee, it does not claim more on this point than I do. We both agree that as to fishing vessels there was under the convention of 1818 no right to enter ports and harbors of the British provinces (except on the southern coast of Newfoundland and southern coast of Labrador, wherein the right to cure and dry fish was granted) but for the four purposes named. This restriction of the purposes of entry is not left to implication, but rests on an express stipulation—"for no other purpose whatever."

Mr. President, there is no need here to explain why this was so, for the language is so plain there is no room for doubt or dispute. American fishing vessels have the right to enter British ports or harbors for the four named purposes, but for no other whatever.

Thus the matter stood under the convention of 1818, and thus the matter stood, as admitted by the committee, till what is called the arrangement of 1830 was made. It is claimed by the committee that this arrangement changed all this as to American fishing vessels. The claim is utterly unfounded.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. President, there was no treaty of commerce or navigation between the United States and Great Britain till the year 1794. By the third article of that treaty it was provided that there should be free and reciprocal rights of intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in America by land and by inland navigation, with right to navigate the inland waters of each and to carry on trade and commerce in that way with each other. But it was especially stipulated that this provision did not extend to the admission of United States vessels into the seaports, harbors, bays, and creeks of the British dominions, nor into the rivers between their mouths and the highest ports of entry from the sea, except small vessels between Montreal and Quebec, nor to the admission of British vessels from the sea into the rivers of the United States beyond the highest port of entry for other foreign vessels. The free navigation of the Mississippi by both parties was also provided for.

By the twelth article certain reciprocal rights of trade between the United States and the British West Indies were provided for, terminable, however, in two years after the war in which Great Britain was then engaged. By article 13 certain privileges of trade between the United States and the East Indies were granted and regulated. By article 28 the treaty as to all its commercial parts was made temporary, extending only to twelve years.

In 1815 another treaty of navigation and commerce was concluded. By this treaty a reciprocal commerce between the United States and the British possessions in Europe was agreed to; and it was also stipulated that the trade between the United States and the British North American and West Indian colonies should be unaffected by the treaty.

This treaty was limited to four years, but afterwards, by the convention of 1818, was prolonged for ten years, and then in 1827 was continued indefinitely.

Thus under treaty stipulations stood intercourse, commercial, and navigation rights between the United States and Great Britain in the year 1830, when the arrangement of that year was entered into, and so far as the right of commerce from the sea is concerned, the entry of American vessels into the seaports, bays, and harbors of the British North American possessions, there was none whatever.

LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS AS TO TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

I notice now the legislation of the United States on this subject, being action from which we could have receded at any time. It appears there had been exclusion of American vessels, commercial vessels, from British ports when there was no exclusion from our ports of British vessels coming from ports from which we were excluded.

Therefore, on April 18, 1818, the United States undertook to correct this inequality by providing that the ports of the United States should be and remain closed against every vessel owned in whole or in part by British subjects coming or arriving from any British port which by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade are closed against vessels of the United States. Stringent regulations were made to prevent an evasion of this law by vessels which, coming into our ports from British ports not closed against us, but which in departing from our ports might go to a closed British port. (See Statutes at Large, volume 3, page 432.) This act was passed, it will be noted, before the convention of 1818.

On the 15th of May, 1820, a supplement to the last named act was passed. This act excluded from the ports of the United States, British vessels coming from Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, New Foundland, Cape Breton, and their dependencies, also from the Bahama, Bermuda, and Caicos islands, or any other possession of Great Britain in the West Indies or continent of America south of the southern boundary of the United States, and not included in the prohibition of the act of 1818. These two acts it will be noted were acts of exclusion, acts of retaliation, and the last one, it will also be noted, was in no respect contingent but was absolute, excluding from American ports all British vessels from the British colonial ports named in it without specifying that such exclusion should be dependent on a similar exclusion of vessels of the United States.

On May 6, 1822, another act was passed; this was an act of relaxation. It provided that on the President being satisfied that the ports in the British West Indies had been opened to the vessels of the United States, he should issue his proclamation admitting British vessels coming from these colonies. This act was to be continued in force till the end of the next session of Congress and no longer.

It will be noted, however, that this relaxation did not apply to vessels coming from the British North American provinces. As to them the exclusion of the act of May 1, 1820, continued in full force. (See 3 Statutes at Large, page 681.)

On March 1, 1823, another act was passed. This act suspended the acts of 1818 and the supplementary act of May 15, 1820, so far as their provisions limit or interdict navigation and commerce between the United States and certain named British ports. These ports were in the West Indies and in the British North American provinces. St. John's and St. Andrew's in New Brunswick, Halifax in Nova Scotia, Quebec in Canada, St. John's in Newfoundland were those named in the North American provinces.

The right of British vessels, however, was confined to importing in the United States articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the places from which the vessels came, and to exporting to the same places articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States.

The act was to continue in force so long, and only so long, as the enumerated British ports should remain open to vessels of the United States conformably to an act of Parliament of June 24, 1822. It was further provided that if any other British port in America should be thereafter opened to American ships, then ships of that port should be admitted into our ports. (See 3 Statutes at Large, page 741.)

Mr. President, in relation to commercial intercourse between the British provinces in North America and the United States matters stood in this way at the date of the arrangement, so called, of 1830. That from the five named British colonial ports, Quebec, Halifax, St. Andrew's and St. John's in New Brunswick, and St. John's in Newfoundland British vessels were admitted into all the ports of the United States when importing products of the places from which each might come, and reciprocally these five ports were open to our vessels. In this it will be noticed that the rights of the British vessels coming from these ports admitted them to all our ports, whilst American vessels were admitted only to these five ports.

The statutes and regulations under them for commerce and traffic were not understood in any way to relate to the fisheries; as to them it is admitted on all hands that up to the arrangement of 1830 they stood alone upon the convention of 1818.

Mr. President, up to this time there had been no dispute or complaint about the convention of 1818 so far as it related to fishery rights. It had not then been discovered that this convention was the result of a want of sagacity and courage on the part of the American commissioners, or that it was a deliberate surrender of our fishery rights, as stated by the Senator from Maine; or if it had been discovered we had not published our shame and made it the plea for a forced construction of that convention. So far as I have learned, both parties were satisfied with the bargain which had been made. Under it our vessels of all kinds were excluded from British ports for commercial purposes, and our fishing vessels were excluded except for the four purposes named in the convention, shelter, repairs, wood, and water.

But there was dissatisfaction with the commercial arrangements between the British possessions in America and the United States. Especially was the trade with the West Indies very desirable to us. It may be mentioned here that one of the great industries of the United States at that time was the making of rum, and one of the great industries of the West Indies, and also of many other portions of this wicked world, given over then to the gratification of their appetites and passions, was drinking rum. This useful and tempting article was manufactured from molasses. Molasses was a product of the West Indies. The West Indians had molasses to sell. We wanted it, that it might be converted into the more valuable and more saleable article, rum, which we were anxious to make, both for domestic use, I must admit, and also for exportation.

This connection between rum, and molasses as the raw material for rum, and that provision—peculiar in itself—of our act of 1830, which granted commercial rights in our ports to the British Provinces without requiring reciprocal rights for our people in theirs, our grant as to this being mere boot given for reciprocal and mutual commercial rights between the United States and the West Indies, will be seen and fully appreciated when I state the history connected with the act of 1830. It appears, sir, from authentic records, that on the very day of the passage of the act of 1830 by the House of Representatives, that a bill was also passed to reduce the tariff on imported molasses. It had not then been discovered that the way to reduce the price of any commodity was to increase the tax on it. That wonderful discovery in political economy was, in the dispensation of Providence, reserved as the achievement of a later generation, who having partaken of that forbidden fruit in the garden of Republican liberty, the transfer by law of the labors of some—of many—into the pockets of others—a few—found out that all the laws of mathematics, all the teachings of arithmetic were wrong, contrived by the wicked inventor to favor British interests, and that the addition of one thing to another made the sum smaller, and the subtraction of one from another was real increase and enlargement; and hence, that the more that is taken from the tax-payer the more he has left. This discovery being now made, I submit it to my honorable friends on the other side of the Chamber whether, when we come to remodel the tariff, it would not be well, in order to protect the great trusts and monopolies, to prohibit entirely the introduction of all works on mathematics and even tax highly their making at home. In this way only can we effectually prevent British aggressions and save our people from that enlightenment which will detect the iniquities of protection. We have made a start in that direction in passing the international copyright bill. So, then, being ignorant of this great discovery, in order to encourage the making of rum by cheapening the price of imported molasses, the tariff tax was reduced.

But if I stop here it will be supposed that the main purpose of this reduction was in order that the poor common working people of this country could get cheap molasses for food, and thus I would be suspected of trying to support the old economic idea still cherished by the party to which I belong, that articles of necessity and comfort for the poor ought to be taxed lightly. I must add, this view of that measure is not entirely correct; for the bill further provided that there should be a drawback, or a return of the reduced duties collected on imported molasses whenever the rum into which it had been converted was exported. This act became a law the same day with the celebrated act of 1830. (See 4 Statutes at Large, page 419.)

On this particular point it will be useful to refer to some statistics. From these it will be seen that both the importation of molasses and the exportation of rum were at that time in no healthy condition. In fact, both were fast approaching the point where certain death was imminent. In 1828 the importation of molasses was 13,285,998 gallons. In 1830, the date of the act, it had fallen to 8,340,783 gallons, a falling off of about 33 per cent. In 1831, the very first year after the act, the importation was more than doubled, being 16,915,959 gallons, and with slight fluctuations it reached in 1835 to 18,656,224 gallons. We turn now to the exportation of rum. In 1828 the exports amounted to 506,052 gallons; in 1830, keeping pace with the decreased imports of molasses, the exports were only 153,160 gallons, a falling off of more than 66 per cent. The effect of the act on the exports of rum was not so rapid as on the importation of molasses. The exports continued to decrease during the next three years. Why this was so I am unable to explain further than that there might have been, probably was, an increased domestic consumption, for it is certain that under the influence of cheap rum there must have been a great increase in the consumption of intoxicants. So on this point again we find that history repeats itself. In 1830 by Congressional action rum was cheapened at the expense of the necessaries of life in order to protect the fisheries, and so now in 1888, more than half a century afterwards, we find the Republican party in national convention assembled, solemnly declaring that we must have cheap whisky rather than that one jot or tittle of the burdens imposed by the present iniquitous tariff shall be removed from blankets, common clothing, salt, agricultural and mechanical implements, and the like articles of common and necessary use among the farmers and laborers of the country. But after awhile this increased demand was met, the appetites of the people for intoxicants, though stimulated by Congressional action, were at last satiated, and our foreign trade adjusting itself to the condition of satiety at home, began to respond to the beneficial force of this act.

In 1834 the readjustment came, and with it a large increase in the exports of rum, being nearly three times the amount exported in the previous year. In the next year, 1835, the full effect of the reduction and drawback was seen, the exports of rum being 507,970 gallons, and more than in the prosperous year for rum, 1828.

Mr. President, this curious and interesting portion of our history, of which the Committee on Foreign Relations seem to be as oblivious as they are of the true American doctrine as to the jurisdiction of our country over its bays, sounds, and the adjacent seas, would be incomplete if I stop here. This idea, so prominent in the legislation of 1830, of the intimate and essential connection between free or cheap molasses as the raw material of rum and the prosperity of our fisheries did not originate in that year. It is older than the Government itself, and has been fostered and encouraged from the beginning by those who claimed to be the especial friends of the fisheries.

In 1733, one hundred years less three before the act of 1830, the British Government imposed duties on rum, molasses, and sugar imported into the American colonies from all the West Indies except their own. These products had been exchanged for our fish. Before the commencement of this trade with those islands molasses was thrown away, and it was first saved and put into casks to be brought to New England to be distilled into rum. The people of the northern colonies insisted that unless they could continue to sell fish to the West Indies and—

> Import molasses from thence to be manufactured into spirits for domestic consumption and for trade with the Indians they could not prosecute the fisheries without ruinous losses.

I quote from Senate Executive Document No. 22, Thirty-second Congress, second session, page 311. It is further stated that New England never submitted to the law, and therefore the threatened ruin to the cod-fishery was averted. That is the way in which this connection between the fisheries and rum was viewed during the colonial era.

In 1789, at the first session of the first Congress under the Constitution, this matter came up again. It was proposed by Mr. Madison and others to tax imported molasses 8 cents per gallon. Among other arguments to support this tax it was urged that molasses was converted into rum, a deleterious substance, injurious to the health and to the morals of the people. This tax was resisted in able speeches by Messrs. Thacher, Goodhue, and Fisher Ames, all of Massachusetts. Especially was the resistance of Mr. Ames able and effective. He urged that we exchange for molasses those fish that it is impossible to dispose of anywhere else, and the molasses we converted into rum; that it is scarcely possible to maintain our fisheries with advantage if the commerce for summer fish is injured, which he asserted would happen if a high duty was imposed on molasses, and that it would carry destruction throughout all the New England States and eventually affect the whole Union. He relied greatly on the West Indian market, saying:

> Our best fish will find their way to the best markets, while the slaves in the West Indies would consume the refuse.

The proposed tax of 8 cents a gallon was defeated, and only 2½ cents per gallon imposed.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that some progress, or rather some change, was made in the animus of the molasses and rum trade in the century intervening the British act of 1733 and the American act of 1830. At the former period we wanted molasses in exchange for our fish, in order, having converted it into rum, that we might carry on a profitable trade with the Indians, then abounding all over the continent. In the century following the trade had done its "good and perfect work," so that but few of these untutored sons of nature remained to whom we could exchange this exhilarating beverage. They had mostly departed to the happy hunting grounds of the Great Spirit—hastened on their journey thither by the spirits distilled by Americans, under the patronage and encouragement of the American Congress, from West Indian molasses, raised by the labor of poor African slaves, to cheer whose hard toil we charitably contributed, for a proper quid pro quo, our refuse fish for which there was no other market under the sun. In 1830, having lost in this way most of our Indian customers, we sought customers in foreign nations, and hence the provision in the act of that year allowing a drawback on exported rum.

Now, Mr. President, if the Committee on Foreign Relations had remembered this portion of our history, they would have saved themselves from the great error into which they have fallen in supposing that the arrangement of 1830, as they are pleased to call it, had any reference whatever to reciprocal trade between the United States and the British colonies to the North and East of us. They would also have seen that the boot we gave in that arrangement, to wit, admission to our ports of vessels from those colonies without exacting like admission to ours, was but the regular outcome and fruit of a policy a hundred years old—of getting a trade with the West Indies by which we could get easily and cheaply molasses as the raw material for rum in exchange for refuse fish, to be eaten by the poor Africans of those islands. The committee erred in not giving due weight to this combination of philanthropy and pelf, of pseudo Christian grace and real commercial greed, which in all ages has been potential, and in our own irresistible.

Now let us see what the act of 1830 was. It provided that whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that Great Britain will open the ports in its colonial possessions, in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, in the Bahama Islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer Islands to the vessels of the United States, on terms, as to importations and exportations from and to said possessions and the United States, of exact equality with British vessels, and at same time leaving the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it then was, the President should by proclamation admit British vessels coming from said colonial possessions into the ports of the United States on the same terms of reciprocal equality; and certain restricting acts of commerce were suspended or repealed.

Now this is the first section of the act. If the act had stopped there, it would have been on its face fair and equal. In that case it would have given a reciprocity in the ports in those British colonies only in which reciprocity was granted to us. But it would not have secured us that commerce so essential to our happiness—molasses as the raw material for rum. For, as has been stated, by the act of May 6, 1822, we had offered reciprocity to England between our ports and her West Indian ports, and that this proposition had for eight years been rejected.

But the act did not stop here. We had found that an even swap could not be had, and we therefore must offer more. So the act had a second section, a very important section in throwing light on the matter under discussion. This second section provides that whenever the ports of the United States are opened according to the provision of the first section—that is, whenever our vessels shall be admitted to equal and reciprocal trade in the West Indies, South America, the Bahamas, Caicos, and Bermudas—then vessels from the British provinces north and east of the United States, or, in other words, from the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland, shall be admitted into an entry in the ports of the United States.

And the President on receiving such evidence did issue his proclamation accordingly, exactly as required; so that this statute or arrangement of 1830 did not stipulate, did not contract for admission of American vessels of any sort into the British North American ports—the ports of the Dominion of Canada and of Newfoundland, for any purpose whatever. If the British conceded such admission to commercial vessels of the United States, they admitted them of their own free will, on motives and reasons applicable to them alone, and the concession, whatever it may have been, was just as broad or just as narrow as they pleased to make it, and embraces just such things as they intended to include in it, and they were at liberty to withdraw or modify it at any time. It was a free grant on the part of Great Britain, without consideration from or agreement with the United States. Whatever they should do in this respect was not within the meaning or contemplation of our act of 1830. That we granted by that act commercial intercourse to the British North American possessions has nothing to do with the concession of a similar right to us. Our proposition offering commerce with the British North American possessions was clearly a price paid—an extra price paid—to secure commercial reciprocity with the other British possessions. It was mere boot given on an exchange of that reciprocal intercourse because of its greater value to us, in great part because of our use for molasses as the raw material of rum.

Mr. President, this is so plain on the face of the statute that further argument is unnecessary. Yet as the Committee on Foreign Relations take a different view of it, I will fortify it by authority.

The authority I refer to is the conduct of our fishermen after 1830, and the diplomatic correspondence of the United States. No commercial rights were claimed by our fishermen under this arrangement of 1830 for many years, and none by our statesmen until a very recent period. Whoever will peruse Senate Executive Document No. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session, in relation to seizures of American fishing vessels made by the British provinces, will see that it was conceded on all hands that our fishing vessels had no commercial rights under the so-called arrangement of 1830.

The schooner Shetland was seized in 1839 for a violation of the convention of 1818 in exercising commercial rights, the master selling a pair of trousers, 1 pound of tea, and 6 pounds of tobacco to a boy. The complaint of the seizure made by our Government was not that we had commercial rights, the right to sell those things, but that the master had been entrapped by the authorities into making the sale; that the whole thing was too trivial to warrant a seizure of the vessel. So in case of the schooner Hart, seized for giving two barrels of herrings as the price for picking the schooner's nets. Here again there was no claim on our part of commercial rights, we relying as a defense on the insignificance of the transaction. And in case of the Eliza the owners defended themselves upon the ground—

That they neither sold, bartered, nor parted with any article whatever out of said schooner.

And in case of the Amazon the master and his men defended against the seizure by swearing—

That there were no articles on board but fishing supplies, and that no article was sold or taken from the vessel.

Mr. Barnes, the naval officer at Boston, reporting on these seizures in 1839, states the facts in one case, as follows:

"The master had on board a keg of tobacco for the use of the crew. An inhabitant of the province begged the captain to sell him a few pounds, for which he paid in wood. The purchaser immediately informed the provincial officers, and the vessel and cargo were seized."

Mr. Barnes says the result of the trial cannot be predicted, but he adds: "The owners and persons interested hope, however, that the tribunal will discriminate between cases of a flagrant and premeditated violation of the treaty and laws of the provinces and mere trivial, unimportant, and fortuitous offenses."

This was the excuse. No claim was made of commercial rights under the arrangement of 1830. In case of the "Independence," Grantham, the consular agent of the United States, reports: The trouble was that, at the earnest solicitation of an inhabitant, the master loaned him a net for one night, and secured therefor a few herrings. In another case he reports the offense was that the Americans received from a British fishing vessel two barrels of herring for assisting the master in clearing his nets. Yet no complaint was made by him that these seizures were in violation of the arrangement of 1830; the complaint was only that they were for trivial, unimportant, and fortuitous infractions of the convention of 1818 and the provincial laws.

On August 14, 1839, Mr. Vail, Acting Secretary of State, made a report to the President, Mr. Van Buren, of the various seizures of our fishing vessels. He makes no claim of commercial rights. On the contrary, he expressly states (see Executive Document, before named, page 95) that our only privilege of entering in the British ports was for shelter, repairs, wood, and water, "and no other."

Lieutenant Paine, who had been sent to examine into these matters, in his letter and report to Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State, expressly states that our fishing vessels have no commercial rights. (Executive Document No. 100, before cited.)

And in 1841 Mr. Forsyth, in his dispatch of that date to Mr. Stevenson, after all the seizures I have just referred to had been made, sets up as the American claim the right to fish up to within 3 marine miles of the shore, but makes no complaint of these seizures for a violation of our alleged commercial rights; nor does he claim any such rights.

He inclosed to Mr. Stevenson a copy of the statute of Nova Scotia of March 12, 1836, regulating fishing rights of American vessels, which was enacted professedly on its face to enforce the convention of 1818, denying to us commercial rights, and makes complaint of its harsh provisions as to procedure, etc., but does not intimate an objection that it interferes with our commercial rights under the arrangement of 1830.

Diplomatic correspondence concerning the troubles of our vessels in these waters was carried on by Mr. Everett in 1844 and 1845, and no mention was made of commercial rights under the so-called arrangement of 1830.

In 1853 there was also a diplomatic correspondence between the two countries on this subject, and yet whilst it was acknowledged that the British desired to enter into a treaty for reciprocal commercial rights between the United States and the British provinces, no intimation was made that any such rights of fishing vessels existed.

Mr. President, that the British Provinces made harsh and unneighborly and unjust regulations, and enforced them with a stringency and rigor without justification or excuse, is true. That disputes were constantly arising concerning their captures of our vessels for a violation of their regulations is also true. That there had arisen a dispute about the extent of our fisheries in the bays and inlets of the British Provinces is also true. That these disputes threatened the peace of the two nations and finally resulted in the treaty of 1854, fixing reciprocity in trade in about thirty articles of commerce, is also true. Yet in all these troubles, in all these disputes and discussions and negotiations, there is not a single syllable, as far as I have observed, which set up any claim for commercial rights to our fishing vessels under the arrangement of 1830, so called, or on any other ground.

The treaty of 1854 especially recites as the reason for making it that misunderstanding had arisen in regard to fishing rights under Article I of the convention of 1818, making no allusion to any dispute about any commercial right whatever, or to the so-called arrangement of 1830. That treaty postponed the trouble during its existence. In 1866 it was terminated in the manner and for the reasons stated and explained so ably and clearly by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Then again we were left to the troubles and disputes about the extent of fishing rights under the convention of 1818. The matter was again postponed by the treaty of 1871, which was terminated in 1885. During all this time there was no claim set up for our fishing vessels that they had commercial rights under the so-called arrangement of 1830. Up to about the year 1885 our statesmen had neither the sagacity to see nor the courage to claim (if I may paraphrase the Senator from Maine, Mr. FRYE), that this arrangement of 1830 gave commercial rights to our fishing vessels.

Now, sir, under the circumstances is it too much to say that such claim made at this late date in opposition to the clear and plain meaning of the statute of 1830 is without substantial foundation.

COMMERCIAL LICENSES TO OUR FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. President, it is needful that I should notice another argument sometimes pressed in favor of commercial rights to our fishing vessels. This argument is based on licenses granted by the United States to fishing vessels to exercise commercial privileges. That such licenses would have the effect within our jurisdiction, within the boundaries of the United States, to confer commercial rights on fishing vessels is undoubted. But, sir, is a solemn treaty between great civilized nations—Christian nations—which admits our fishing vessels into the ports of the other treaty power for shelter, for repairs, for wood, and for water, "and for no other purpose whatever," to be set at naught by us by the mere granting to our fishing vessels a license to do that which the treaty declares they shall not do in the ports of the British Provinces? Can we evade the obligations of a treaty by attempting of our own motion to secure rights to our vessels denied by the treaty in giving an additional and simulated character to these vessels? The plain meaning of the treaty is to exclude fishing vessels for all purposes whatsoever except the four named in it—shelter, repairs, wood, and water. Can we introduce them for another purpose by merely granting them a license to enter for such other purpose? Sir, it is too plain for argument, that we can not introduce the unlawful and prohibited by annexing to it of our motion something else which is not unlawful and not prohibited. We can not introduce a pest-ship full of disease into a friendly port merely because such ship may have in her commercial character the right of entry, not even if such ship be loaded with the very articles of medicine necessary to arrest or extirpate the disease.

THE PROPOSED TREATY EXAMINED.

Mr. President, the discussion now brings me to a comparison of the old and the new—an examination of American rights as they will be if this treaty be ratified as contrasted with our rights as they now exist under the convention of 1818.

Under the convention of 1818, now in force, our treaty rights, in addition to taking fish on the high seas (whether coming from the treaty of 1783 or the law of nations is immaterial), are—a. On the southern coast of Newfoundland, from Cape Ray to the Ramea Islands.

First, to take fish, as follows:

b. On the western coast of the same, from Cape Ray to Quirpon Island, on the northern extremity of Newfoundland.
c. On the shores of Magdalen Island.
d. On the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of the coast of Labrador, from Mt. Joli indefinitely northward.

These are the positive concessions, and no more. It will be noted that there is no concession to take fish on the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Cape Breton, and on the remainder of the coast of Newfoundland not mentioned above, including all its eastern and part of its southern coast.

The liberty of curing and drying fish is granted on the southern coast of Newfoundland from Cape Ray to the Ramea Islands and on the coasts of Labrador.

Then comes the renunciation of the United States, which is of the liberty theretofore claimed or enjoyed of taking, drying, or curing fish "on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors of all other of His Majesty's dominions," which, as I have shown conclusively, means 3 miles from the coasts and 3 miles from the entrance of the bays, etc., our claim, however, being to 3 miles from the shores in all bays more than 6 miles wide.

Under the treaty now before us as to fishing rights we have the right to take fish as before, under the convention of 1818:

a. On the southern and western coasts of Newfoundland.
b. On the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador, besides our rights in the open seas.
c. On the shores of the Magdalene Islands.

So far the convention and treaty are the same. Under the true construction of the convention of 1818 we have no right of entering into any of the bays, harbors, or creeks, except for shelter, repair, wood, and water, being expressly excluded from entry for any "other purpose whatever."

Under the treaty we may enter for the same purposes, and in addition under the second clause of Article XI we may enter "established ports of entry" to purchase supplies for the homeward voyage, and our fishing vessels are to have on all occasions in such ports the liberty to purchase casual or needful provisions or supplies.

This is a very important gain, as I shall show hereafter.

Under the convention of 1818, when our vessels entered into any of the British ports for shelter, repairs, wood, or water, they were subject to port charges, to be made to report, enter and clear, to compulsory pilotage, to harbor dues, and light dues. The exercise of these rights, or some of them, had been the causes of great expense, trouble, and annoyance to our fishing vessels.

That these charges were common is seen throughout our diplomatic correspondence, and the complaints made by our fishermen. (See Senate Executive Document No. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session, on pages 73, 74, 77, 79, 80, 81, and Nos. 11 and 47 in list of vessels furnished by minority report on this treaty, commencing on page 52.)

Under the treaty on entry of our vessels for the four purposes named they are required only to conform to harbor regulations common to them and to the fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland. They need not report or clear when entry is for shelter or repairs, nor when entering outside of established ports of entry for wood or water; and they are not liable for compulsory pilotage, nor when in for shelter, repairs, wood, and water are they liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues. This is a great gain for our vessels. Under the convention of 1818 an American vessel having entered a bay or harbor for any of the four purposes therein mentioned, namely, shelter, repairs, wood, and water, could do nothing and procure nothing but these four things. Under the treaty by Article XI, any vessel entering for any casualty whatever may unload, reload, transship, or sell all fish on board when necessary or incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall have all needful facilities, including shipping of a crew.

These are important gains under the treaty, and essential even in many cases to a successful trip of a vessel. Under the same article our fishing vessels may, on their homeward voyage, have licenses free of charge for the purchase of supplies in established ports of entry; and our vessels also on all occasions are to have licenses to purchase casual and needful supplies and provisions.

These licenses to purchase supplies in established ports of entry are of the utmost importance, and of themselves ought to require of us a ratification of the treaty.

Mr. President, in the fishing business, as in nearly all others, the tendency of modern economic and industrial arrangements has been to crush out all small enterprises and men of small means and small capital. So that we are now, at the end of this century of so-called progress met, face to face with this, to me, appalling state of affairs, that small, independent workers, who formerly owned their own ships and conducted personally their own affairs, are being driven—in fact, almost entirely driven—from business by the greater economy and efficiency of larger enterprises, larger establishments, wherein the owners and managers are not workers and the laborers are merely wage-receivers. The almost infinite subdivision of labor, on account of its greater productive efficiency when so subdivided, has produced and is producing, as a necessary consequence thereof, a division of mankind into two classes, one—and that a small one—large capitalists, wage-payers, and the other—the many—wage-receivers. This subdivision has also had a tendency to narrow and compress the energies and the faculties of laborers, by confining the mind to the performance of a single kind of work, which, after some practice, produces skillfully, and well, by the mere trained operation of the hand, without conscious mental effort. One of the results of this subdivision is that laborers confined for years to the performance of a single manual operation become incapable of that variety of thought so necessary to conduct skillfully a successful business.

This is one of the great obstacles which men, once entering one of these large establishments and devoting their attention for years to one simple operation of manual labor, are rarely able to overcome successfully, and which prevents them from emerging from the class of wage-earners.

As enterprises, as establishments become larger and larger, necessarily this division makes the managing class relatively smaller and the laboring class relatively larger. This, Mr. President, is not a good thing for the wage-earners, and not being good for them, it is not a good thing for the country, not a good thing for the human race. How this tendency may be counteracted and reversed I may not be able to determine; but seeing it, feeling deeply its pernicious and baleful workings, I declare it to be the duty of the Government when two courses are open in any proposed matter, one to increase the tendency, the other having a contrary effect, to choose the latter. In the beginning, when inshore fisheries were allowed to us, and a frequent resort to the shore, the fishing vessels were small. It needed but small capital to own one and but few men to manage it successfully; hence in those days the owners of these small vessels were frequently part of the crew which sailed them and took fish. It was not beyond the hopes and aspirations of the poorest sailor and fisherman working in one of these vessels that in a few years he might be the sole or a part owner of the vessel on which he worked.

But, sir, this is all now changed—the vessels are large, the equipments in seines and other supplies more expensive; so that they who run and manage the vessel and take the fish are rarely, if ever, interested in the vessel itself.

Now, Mr. President, if we give, as this treaty does, the opportunity of smaller vessels being employed in the fisheries, we will have done much to arrest the evil tendency I have noted. If we secure a resort alone to the shores on easy terms, not only for wood, water, repairs, and shelter, but for supplies of all kinds, together with transport of the catch, we encourage the use of the smaller vessels, we encourage independent, smaller workers in the owning of the vessels on which they sail. I think this is one of the most beneficent effects of the treaty, even as it now stands, and these benefits would be increased if we hereafter secure the reciprocity proposed by Article XV of the treaty.

I send to the desk a copy of a letter on this subject written by Mr. Dimick, secretary of the Boston Fish Bureau, to Mr. Switzler, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, which he has sent to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, in the chair). The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU, No. 3 LONG WHARF,
Boston, June 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR: It is almost impossible for me to answer the questions you have asked. The bureau was organized in 1875, and has kept statistics of vessels and men engaged in the northeast fisheries only since 1880. An accurate record of the comparative size of fishing vessels would be compiled, I think, only from the records of the custom-houses at the fishing ports. It is impossible to separate vessels that fish on our shore and those that fish on the Canadian coast for a long period of years. Some years nearly the whole mackerel fleet goes to the Gulf of St. Lawrence (generally spoken of as the "North Bay"), and some years very few.

In a general way I can say that the average size of fishing vessels (leaving out the small craft which fish only close to our shore) is probably twice that of fifty years ago.

The average crew has largely increased, but not quite in proportion to increase in the size of vessel.

There is a very much smaller proportion of fishermen owners than formerly. This is owing mainly to the fact that the majority of the fishermen (outside of the small craft which furnish fresh fish for the daily market, which fish near the shore) are foreigners.

I am told that fifty years ago, on Cape Cod, three-fourths of the fishermen were owners in the fishing vessels and that there are not one-fourth now.

Gloucester, our largest fishing port, has practically no fishermen owners. A few captains are owners or part owners of their vessels, but the number is very small.

The comparative cost of fitting a vessel is a very difficult matter to arrive at. It varies from year to year with the varying price of supplies in the market.

In the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, wages of codfishermen were considerably reduced, and owing to this and cheapness of some supplies, the cost of catching codfish was less than for many years. This year it will be a little more as price of salt is higher, and wages on the whole a trifle higher.

Very truly yours,

F. F. DIMICK, Secretary.

Mr. W. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. GEORGE. In addition to that, I obtained from the Treasury Department some statistics showing the increase in the size of the fishing vessels. In 1775 the average tonnage of fishing vessels was 37 tons. In 1830 it was 41 tons. In 1854 it was 67 tons. In 1865 it was 76 tons. In 1871 it was 81 tons. In 1885 it was 100 tons.

So we see there has been a continued and steady advance in the size of the vessels, and at the same time a continued and steady decrease in the ownership of vessels by the fishermen.

OBJECTION AS TO NON-PREVENTION OF BRITISH RIGHTS IN OUR PORTS.

Mr. President, it is complained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations that the treaty does not put the fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland in American ports on the same footing with American fishing vessels in their ports. This certainly is a very curious objection, if it be well founded. The treaty in that view secures the rights named in it to our vessels, and leaves us to give or grant to the Canadian vessels just such rights as we please in our ports. This is exactly what has been done in all our treaties on this subject. In the treaty of 1783 not a word was said about the rights of British provincial fishing vessels in the ports of the United States, and so in the convention of 1818. Both those international compacts were made to secure and protect American rights. The British in neither claimed nor asked for similar rights for their vessels in our ports. This left us, Mr. President, in the best possible of all conditions. We had treaty rights in the British ports and they had none in ours. If they exercise any rights here, it is by our grace and permission. We may grant such rights on such terms as we please, change or modify them, or withdraw them altogether. Whatever our conduct may be in reference to Canadian vessels, we still have our rights named in this treaty, rights secured by it without granting similar rights to the Canadians. That might be an objection from the Canadian standpoint, but certainly is no reason why Americans should reject the treaty. The twelfth article of the treaty does, however, secure (what the treaty of 1783 and convention of 1818 did not) the same rights to Canadian vessels that are secured to us.

This was a demand of the British provinces that we could not decently resist. But that is not the objection which the Committee on Foreign Relations make. Their objection is, that this article did not go further and by negative words restrict the rights of Canadian vessels in our ports to the treaty rights secured to our vessels in the ports of the Dominion and of Newfoundland. Let us look at this matter a little. The treaty rights of the vessels of both countries are exactly the same under this new treaty. These rights each Government is by the treaty bound to the other to observe. A refusal to do this would be a violation of treaty obligations, which would release the other party and even give good cause for war. When these rights are respected the treaty is satisfied. As to other and additional rights, each Government, in virtue of its sovereignty and independence, may grant or withhold them at its own will, and if at any time it shall grant any such rights it may recall them at pleasure. The objection of the committee, therefore, is that the United States do not in this treaty bind themselves to take away rights which they may have voluntarily granted and tie their hands from granting any such rights in the future. The committee insist that the United States shall enter into an obligation restricting its own sovereign powers.

They complain that the United States by this treaty are left free to act for their own interests in all matters outside of the treaty, so that if it shall be, as it is, to the interest of our people to sell fishing supplies to Canadian vessels, or if any other right granted to the Canadian vessels would be more to our benefit than to theirs, we shall be bound by the treaty not to grant it, however much we might desire for our own advantage to do so.

THE NUMBERING OF THE VESSELS.

Like this is the objection that we may grant licenses to the Canadian vessels without their being numbered. On this subject we are left by the treaty free to require such numbering or not as we may see proper. All there is of this is that the Dominion was not willing to be bound to grant these licenses without the numbering. We wanted the licenses as a treaty right and they stipulated to give them, but on the terms named in the treaty, we, as to these, being left to do just as we please, for the twelfth article only secures to Canadian vessels the same rights our vessels have by the treaty; and therefore if an American vessel can not without a license to buy trade in a Canadian port without also being numbered, so the Canadian vessels can not have a license to buy in our ports except on the same equal terms if we require it.

THE PENALTIES FIXED BY THE TREATY.

Mr. President, another objection is that the treaty by its fourteenth article fixes penalties for a violation of the treaty.

This—

The committee say—

is a singular provision (and probably unique) to be found in a treaty between two civilized nations, the general tenor of whose laws and the general social nature of whose institutions are very nearly homogeneous.

Whether the committee intends by this objection to complain of the introduction of such a provision in any treaty between civilized nations, or only between Great Britain and the United States, as these are the only two—

The general tenor of whose laws and the general social nature of whose institutions are very nearly homogeneous—

I am unable to say. If they are to be understood as saying that such a provision between the United States and any highly civilized nation is objectionable, then I answer: That such was not the opinion of the fathers; such is not the American doctrine, if the men of the Revolution are to be trusted to expound American doctrines. The treaty of 1778 with France was the first treaty ever made by the United States. As was shown yesterday, by its ninth article it regulated fishing rights between the United States and France, and in doing so it was not deemed by the fathers unique, peculiar, or objectionable, to make a provision in reference to a penalty for a violation of treaty rights, and that penalty, it so happens, is exactly the same penalty as the highest prescribed in the treaty before us, namely, a confiscation of the vessel.

If, however, the committee mean to object only to such a provision in a treaty with England—and not to the justice and rightfulness of the provision itself, I leave it to their wisdom, or their ingenuity, which ever it may require, to explain to the American people, why a treaty should be rejected when made with Great Britain, because it contains a provision admittedly just and honorable in treaties with all other nations.

And, Mr. President, whilst on this subject, I will say that the fourteenth article, on penalties and procedure against vessels violating the treaty, is of great value. It restricts the penalty of forfeiture to unlawful fishing or preparing to fish unlawfully in the prohibited waters. For all other offenses the penalty is not to exceed a fine of $3 per ton. It provides also for speedy and convenient trial of the vessel seized, allows a defense to be made, without security for costs, unless the vessel be bailed—requires that reasonable bail shall be allowed, and permits appeals only to the owners of our vessels—refusing them to the other side; and requires all judgments of forfeiture to be reviewed by an imperial officer—the governor-general in council.

These are all very valuable rights secured to our citizens by the treaty.

I ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who has examined the subject, to explain our statutes about trials of seizures.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Mississippi asks me to say something about the provisions of our statutes in regard to seizures for violations of the customs laws and customs regulation which I alluded to the other day when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was speaking. I suppose I can best answer his question by giving him a summary that I had made of our statutes in that regard.

Section 909 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which I read at length the other day, provides that in case of seizure for violation of customs laws or duties the burden of proof shall be put upon the man who opposes the seizure. I read that the other day.

Mr. HOAR. Only when probable cause has first been shown for the prosecution.

Mr. GRAY. I will read section 909. I read it at length, I believe, the other day. Section 909 provides:

In suits or informations brought, where any seizure is made pursuant to any act providing for or regulating the collection of duties on imports or tonnage, if the property is claimed by any person, the burden of proof shall lie upon such claimant: Provided, That probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court.

Section 923 of the Revised Statutes, which I will not take the time to read but will give the purport of, obliges the claimant of a vessel or goods seized to give bond to prosecute the suit and respond to costs.

Section 970 of the Revised Statutes in such cases denies costs to the successful opponent of seizure, and relieves the seizing officer from liability for such seizure, if the court thinks there was reasonable cause for the seizure.

Section 975 has similar provisions in another case.

Section 971 mulcts the unsuccessful opponent of seizure in double costs, so that if a person intervenes as the owner of the vessel or goods, denying the legality of the seizure, and does not succeed, this section imposes upon him double costs, making it in all cases at his own risk when he defends a suit.

Section 979 awards to the successful opponent of seizure possession of his property, but only after he has paid his costs.

Section 3073 enables officers making the seizure to plead the general issue and give the act of Congress as special matter in evidence.

That, I presume, covers the point alluded to by the Senator.

THE BRITISH SIDE.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it has been said in this debate, and will probably again be said, that the contention of those who favor the ratification of the treaty is on the British side; that it surrenders American rights; is contrary to American ideas and American principles. One answer to this is that it is my plain duty, that it is the plain duty of the Senate, in determining whether we will accept or reject this treaty, to ascertain fairly and truly our rights as they now exist and compare them with our rights as they would be if this treaty were accepted or ratified. As an American Senator charged by the Constitution of our country with giving advice to the President as to the conclusion of treaties, it is my duty to give this advice honestly, frankly, and on full consideration of every fact, every principle involved, so that he, the sole representative of the American people in our intercourse with foreign nations, may do what an honest and conscientious regard for the welfare and honor of the United States may demand. That this advice might be given freely and fully, without embarrassment or injury to the country, our deliberations on treaties have hitherto, in accordance with the sound judgment and wise and patriotic foresight of our fathers been confidential. In this confidential family meeting of the representatives of the States there was full and free conference and debate, the world being excluded from our deliberations. All party considerations were banished; all desire to attain any other end than the public good was suppressed; each Senator was expected, in the discharge of the high duty imposed by the Constitution to declare to his fellow-Senators fully and freely the facts and the arguments which he deemed proper for their consideration. In the discharge of this duty in this confidential family session there was no danger of injury to our country by the disclosure of views which were in opposition to some of the claims we had put forth. These confidential deliberations are like the confidential communications between our Government and its foreign ministers, matters to be considered only by us. How often, sir, when such communications are afterwards published, does the presence of marks of omission show to us and show to the world that the matter omitted is of that nature that publication of it would not be proper. In the diplomatic correspondence of one of our most eminent statesmen, Mr. Everett, in relation to the very subject we now deliberate upon, are such marks, showing omissions in the published copy.

THE SUPPRESSION OF EVIDENCE.

The attention of the Senate was called to this several weeks ago by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Afterwards the Senator from Alabama, whose services on the Committee on Foreign Relations as the senior member of the minority, on this and other matters concerning our foreign intercourse deserves and will receive the gratitude of the country—afterwards, I say, the Senator from Alabama offered a resolution calling on the President for these omitted portions of Mr. Everett's letter. That resolution, strangely enough, in view of the former action of the majority of the Senate removing confidence and secrecy from all deliberations on this subject, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations for their opinion and advice. For many days, even weeks, and after many meetings of that committee, that resolution sleeps in the unruffled quietude, in the tranquil repose of studied neglect and of lordly contempt. That committee, by the sole action of the majority, every one of whom voted to reverse the traditions and rules of the Senate extending through a century, and thus throw open to the world our debates on the ratification of this treaty, will neither advise nor refuse to advise the Senate to make an effort to uncover one of the important secrets connected with our discussions. They decline to act at all. They neither go forward nor retreat, but stand still in sullen, stubborn silence. They dare not ask the President for the information for fear they may discover something they would not like to know and would not like the American people to know. They dare not recommend a refusal to ask, for that would be to confess in the face of the world that their boasted desire to have all that concerns the ratification of this treaty made known was a mere sham, a miserable pretense, an adroit feint to cover a partisan movement. They dare not ask for it to be communicated in secret session and to be considered in secret session, for that would be an acknowledgment of error in ordering secret sessions abolished, and would also present to the American people the unseemly spectacle that a majority of the American Senate would be guilty of the mere pretense of partial and incomplete open sessions for mere party purposes, returning to secrecy only when it was suspected that something would be disclosed which might operate against party interests, party success.

Sir, this non-action on the resolution of the Senator from Alabama seems to bear the construction that it is the wish of the majority that while we are by their action to have open sessions, yet all that which favors the ratification of the treaty shall in some way be concealed, so that there may be a condemnation of the President at all events, even by a covering up of material facts.

This purpose is by no means a matter of surprise after what has occurred. For the Senate, by requiring this debate to be open, in the hearing of the world, has deliberately abdicated its constitutional executive function of advising and consenting to treaties, so far as this treaty is concerned, and substituted therefor an unseemly wrangle, in order to sustain before the American people a predetermined rejection of a treaty securing to us the most valuable rights and surrendering nothing whatever. This debate on the part of the majority is not for constitutional advice to the President, but is a mere apology for a preordained result, and an arraignment of the President for his action in this matter. Under these circumstances, when diplomatic reserve, secrecy, and confidential consultations have been abandoned without reason relating to the public welfare, but solely to embarrass and bring into disrepute the Administration, and surrendering the welfare of the American people to secure an advantage in a partisan contest, to win victory when victory is not due, I interpret my duty to be to discuss the whole subject freely and fairly, and to notice every fact and argument I deem important. Since the appeal is made to the American people, I construe my duty to be to so act that their judgment should not be invoked on half truths, on a partial and mutilated statement of the case.

Mr. President, if in my investigation of this subject I have reached conclusions adverse to some of the rights sometimes asserted in our behalf, it is a consolation to know that by the treaty under consideration these very rights so alleged to exist, all of them that are valuable, are secured, and in addition many more. It is also a consolation to know that whatever I may say can be of no harm to my country, no injury to any single human being in all this world, save only to myself. In what I have said and shall say, I have spoken and will speak no one's opinion but my own. I pretend to speak and have authority to speak for no person in office or out of office; not knowing and not caring who may approve or who may condemn, save only that great generous and magnanimous people whose commission I hold, and to whom I am responsible for all I do or omit to do as a Senator on this floor. My position in public life is too humble, my influence too limited to give any weight to what I may say, beyond what may be rightly due to the same matter, if written and published anonymously. What I have said is based on public authentic records. If I have mistaken them or misinterpreted them the correction is easy, if correction be deemed necessary by the learned opponents of the treaty. If convicted of error I shall be glad to be corrected; for, sir, I have no feeling, no wish, no interest, no bias nor prejudice, other than to do my duty to the Senate and to my country. But, sir, it should not be forgotten that the main question before us is not as to the absolute verity of the arguments I have advanced, but whether, being urged in opposition to our rights as they have been asserted, they do not constitute a sincere doubt, which ought to be removed by negotiation, and which constitutes a fair ground of compromise of conflicting claims. Can any Senator with confidence say that there is no doubt. And if there be sincere and just ground for doubt, shall we assume the attitude of infallibility denied to all other children of the human race, and say we will not consider even adverse claims, will not treat or negotiate so that there may be, as there will be if this treaty is ratified, a fair and honorable adjustment of these long-standing and irritating disputes.

MR. WEBSTER'S VIEWS.

Mr. Webster, in a circular printed in a Boston paper on July 19, 1852, referring to the claim of Great Britain of rights under the convention of 1818, said:

It was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England. Since—

Now note what follows—

Since the United States had usually considered those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean—

Yes, vast inlets and recesses of the ocean, not the Lilliputian bays, not wider nor larger than Long Island Sound, or Chesapeake, or Delaware Bay—but the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets and recesses of the ocean—

ought to be open to American fishermen as freely as the sea itself to within 3 marine miles of the shore—and not that these vast inlets and recesses were under the convention of 1818 actually so open.

It can not escape notice how careful the language is.

First. He states that there was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818. What is an oversight but a failure to insert something in the convention which would sustain our claims if it had been inserted, or a failure or neglect by which language was used in the convention which militates against our rights?

Second. The oversight was in making "so large a concession to England" as the convention makes. The concession is in relation to the vast inlets and recesses of the ocean, as Mr. Webster states it. Will the Committee on Foreign Relations state what is this large, too large, concession, which was an oversight in the convention of 1818, and which that instrument made, and which concern these vast inlets and recesses, if in fact and in truth it was not a concession, that our rights to fish did not extend to them nor nearer than 3 miles to them? No fair and just answer can be made to this. For Mr. Webster explains his own meaning by giving as the reason for his statement that this large concession was an oversight, "since the United States had usually," not always, not uniformly considered, but "usually considered those vast inlets and recesses of the ocean ought to be open" to the fisherman as freely as the sea itself to within 3 miles of the shore.

Now sir, if, as the committee contend, the true meaning of the convention of 1818 is that the United States had by it a right to take fish in the vast inlets and recesses of the ocean as freely as in the sea itself, to within 3 miles of the shore, then it follows that no concession was made and no oversight committed, and that we actually now have as our undoubted possession what Mr. Webster said by an undoubted oversight we had conceded away to England. Then the undoubted oversight which Mr. Webster said made too large a concession to England, was as his words plainly mean, a failure to have the convention made according to a view which we had usually entertained—that is, as the United States had usually considered that our rights in these vast inlets and recesses were as stated by him—it was an oversight resulting in too large a concession to England that we did not cause the convention to be made according to our theory and understanding.

Mr. Webster in the same circular asserts, as I stated on yesterday, that a bay, as usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and that the term is equally applied to small and large bodies of water. He knew that this term was used in the convention in that clause in which we renounced our fishing rights, renouncing them in bays, harbors, creeks, alike. So he felt impelled to make the remark I have commented on about the concession being too large.

Yet it is said that notwithstanding all this Mr. Webster's opinion is the other way. This contention is based on a remark near the close of the circular, in which he stated his non-agreement to the view that a construction of the convention of 1818 which he had just quoted was conformable to the intention of the contracting parties.

The construction which he had just quoted, and to which he stated his non-agreement, was the construction placed on the convention by the law officers of England, in which the extreme headland theory was asserted, as explained by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] when he addressed the Senate on this subject—a construction and theory which would have excluded us not only from what are properly bays, but from concave indents of the coast where the different and opposing headlands were a hundred miles apart.

But, Mr. President, taking the whole of the circular together, are we prepared to say that there is no doubt about the meaning of the convention of 1818, and that the English construction of it is so clearly in opposition to its true meaning that it deserves no consideration whatever. We should deal fairly with ourselves and with the world in the construction of treaties and the obligation they impose upon us. If we discover that by an oversight, or otherwise, we have made too large a concession, as Mr. Webster said we did, this does not authorize us to construe the treaty as if no oversight had been committed and no concession made. In such a case we are bound to resort to friendly negotiation to correct the oversight—to reduce the concession. This the President has done, so that in the treaty before us there is no concession of any substantial value, even on the theory of international law contended for by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE BRITISH SIDE—ANSWER.

But, sir, the charge of taking the British side in this controversy, if worth making, is worth repelling, and especially so since the answer is complete and overwhelming. The main point in dispute turns upon the question whether the word "bays" used in the convention of 1818 means all "bays" in the British dominions, as Mr. Webster said it did, or only "bays" 6 miles wide and under.

In what I have stated in opposition to the view that "bays" capable of exclusive national dominion are those only 6 miles wide and under, I have but stated the truth of history. If that truth be on the British side, I am not responsible for it. The President is not responsible for it. They who made the history are responsible.

I deny that history is on the British side, and I propose to prevent, so far as I may be able, history from being rewritten so as to be on that side, surrendering forever great American interests. I deny that the great and patriotic men of 1776, who first declared and then won our independence, and who, as I have shown, in that momentous hour when appealing to Heaven for the rectitude of their purposes and committing themselves and their country to the guidance and support of a generous Providence, and seeking alliances to aid them in their struggle for liberty and independence, affirmed in the most solemn manner their right and the right of France under the law of nations to conquer and then occupy as their sole possession and property, exclusive of all other nations, this great fishery in all its parts, on bays large and small and on the ocean itself, in that act, intended and designed to destroy utterly British power in America, were on the British side.

I deny that John Adams, testy, passionate, vehement in speech and in action, with an all-consuming love of his country, and well-informed as to all that concerned her interests and the advancement and welfare of her people—that this man, in his negotiations for the treaty of 1783, in demanding our admission to this fishing on the ground that it was our rightful share in an acquisition and possession of the British people, secured by war, in which we contributed our blood and treasure more than our due proportion, was in that act on the British side. I deny that his no less illustrious son in 1816, when, in resisting British pretensions, based mainly on the position now assumed by the Committee on Foreign Relations and denied by me, namely, that fishing in the open sea in the neighborhood of Newfoundland is the common right of all nations, he affirmed as the basis of our rights that the whole fishery in bays and inlets and on the open seas was before our independence the exclusive possession of the British people, of whom we were a part, and afterwards the joint possession of Great Britian and the United States, was on the British side.

I deny that George Washington and his Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, in 1793, when forcing France to return a British vessel captured in Delaware Bay on the ground that the capture was in American waters, were on the British side.

I deny that Jefferson in claiming that the rightful jurisdiction of the United States over the high seas extended beyond the 3-miles limit to the Gulf Stream, was on the British side.

I deny that the great American jurist, Chancellor Kent, in claiming jurisdiction for the United States over large bodies of sea-water on our eastern coast many miles from the shore, inclosed by lines drawn from distant points of the shore, jutting out into the sea, hundreds of miles apart, and in claiming a like jurisdiction over all that part of the Gulf of Mexico included between the shores, and a line drawn from the southern Cape of Florida to the mouth of the Mississippi, was on the British side.

I deny that the whole American people, in claiming and exercising exclusive jurisdiction over Delaware Bay, 13 miles wide; over Long Island Sound, 10 miles wide; over the Chesapeake, 12 miles wide, are on the British side.

All these claims, sir, are American claims, made by eminent and patriotic Americans, and sustained by the American people, to protect and subserve American rights and American interests. If all these were false to American rights, then I am also false. I may well bear the unjust reproach of being on the British side when in such illustrious company.

AMERICAN RIGHTS AND DUTIES.

Mr. President, I have stated and have endeavored to support what I conceive to be the true view in this controversy. I have stood and I mean to stand on those principles of the law of nations, so far as this continent is concerned, which gives our country her rightful mastery over American seas. I do not intend to barter this great birthright of Americans for an alleged temporary advantage, a mere miserable mess of pottage. The inheritance, the mission of the American people is to occupy for their possession forever the North American continent from the polar seas to the isthmus which connects us with the southern hemisphere, including all islands and seas which lie next to it. The Monroe doctrine was but a half truth, a great advance, and sufficient for the time in which it was announced. That doctrine forbids future European colonization in the western hemisphere. It will in the no very distant future assume its rightful and logical development in the exclusion, or if need be expulsion, from the North American continent and the West Indies of all European territorial and jurisdictional rights.

That, sir, is destiny, certain, inexorable. Nothing can prevent it except the failure of the American people to rise to the height of their great mission, their surrender of doctrines announced by our fathers, their concession of permanent and enduring rights to mere temporary expediency. The colonization and settlement of the North American continent by Europeans was in the first instance a necessity. It was essential to redeem these broad and favored lands from savage worthlessness and reduce them to the service of civilization and progress. Especially, sir, was this colonization by the British people a benefit to the human race, for in the wilderness they planted not only civilization but also the seeds of free institutions, where, unaffected and unhampered by the kingly and monarchical traditions of the Old World, they will reach their full development. But as in Mr. Monroe's time further British as well as further European colonization was a political anachronism, so in the not distant future European possessions before attained will be out of date. This is certain. We may hasten or retard it, but it can not be prevented. We may so act as to cause the aggregation of the people of North America under one flag to be delayed, to be accompanied with friction, even war and bloodshed. We may so act that when this aggregation shall come it will be but a mere forcible conjunction of adverse and hostile peoples, instead of a real union, not only in political but in commercial and social relations.

That the attraction of these peoples to our flag should be by kindness, by friendly acts, the natural result of kindred hopes and kindred aspirations and common interests, is manifestly wiser and better; better for them and better for us. The Canadians are already tutored in self-government. The voluntary transfer of their allegiance to the American flag would result in no friction, no conflicts. So, sir, it is our clear duty, our manifest interests, that in our intercourse with them, whilst maintaining fully American rights, we should not irritate, annoy, or oppress. Such a course will but the more strongly attach them to the great power beyond the seas, to which they will be certain to look for protection and safety. In pursuing this course we but do the work of the British Crown.

Mr. President, we may have, it is not unlikely we will have, our own troubles, which may force us to secure an extension of our borders, or if not our borders the extension of our influence to the south. We have now conditions in our political, social, and industrial life which never before confronted a free people, conditions which might possibly be met with safety for a long time at least in an empire, wherein all the people are subjects, not citizens, and by the iron hand of unsympathizing power, exerted through an imperial and unrelenting militarism are reduced to a common level, a common equality in political slavery and social degradation. In such a government the hopes, the aspirations of the great body of the people reach not beyond the securing of personal safety and that comfort and ease coming from the absence of hunger. Whether they can be met in safety in a democratic republic, wherein the energies of men are so stimulated by liberty as to cause a ceaseless, ever-enduring contest and rivalry for that superiority, that coveted inequality in wealth, social relations, and individual power and influence, which are denied in abstract political rights, and especially when this rivalry is intensified by the commingling of heterogeneous and mutually repellant, diverse peoples, time alone can determine. I can not, no man can, foresee the full extent and effect of the dangers which even now seem to menace us by the incorporation into the body of American citizenship of a race, patient, docile, inoffensive, peaceful though it be, who yet are without ancestral aptitudes for free institutions, without the inherited instincts for self-government, which existing in the Anglo-Saxon race has enabled it to cause progress and advancement in free institutions to be a steady, onward march for more than a millennium.

If it shall turn out to be true, as that distinguished and philosophic statesman, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], asserted in 1882, when advocating the exclusion of the Chinese from this country, that homogeneity in a people is a necessary condition of success in free institutions, as shown by all the long reaches of human history from Aristotle to Webster; if it shall come to pass that Mr. Lincoln shall be proven to be right in declaring that the physical differences between the two races are such as to forever prevent them from living together in one community on terms of perfect equality, then it will also result that there will be in the future, when, no man can tell, that arrangements will be made by the free consent of both races by which that close contact which breeds antagonisms and disorder will be obviated. Whether that will be by one means or another, I do not know. I do know, however, that one of the wisest statesmen who ever lived in this country, Robert J. Walker, more than forty years ago, pondering then on the great problem of African slavery in the United States, or, if you please, on that great crime against human rights, foresaw that it could not be eternal. And considering what was best for the white people of the Union, best for the unfortunate people held in bondage, he looked with hope to the regions south of us as furnishing a solution of the trouble.

As to whether in the providence of God this solution shall ever be demanded by the best interests of both races I express here and now no opinion. But I will say that in my poor judgment it is the duty of American statesmen to commit this country to no policy, to no doctrines of public law which will prevent the American people of both races, of all races, from seeking such outlets as their necessities and their interests may demand for the teeming millions of inhabitants which shall in the great future occupy our land. Before such a danger, before such a necessity, if they shall come, as they may come, all European jurisdictions, all supposed European rights on this continent must give way. The safety of the Republic must be the supreme law.

Mr. President, I am not predicting events; I am not endeavoring with my weak and feeble powers to penetrate into the domain of the unknown and the unknowable. I do not pretend to forecast the future. but in the face of possible and natural dangers felt by the wisest, recognized by the great Senator from Vermont, and also by Mr. Lincoln, I wish to invoke the Senate, not for a mere temporary advantage, even if it were not illusory, not for a mere mess of pottage, not for the poor privilege of a delusive banquet at the phantom feast set before us by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to discard American doctrines, reverse American policies, which being recognized and maintained by us would at least furnish some hope of escape from future troubles and dangers.

If, sir, there be any who seek an escape from these possible dangers, who would have homogeneity by the amalgamation of races, the substitution of hybridism for the pure blood of either or both races, they will be disappointed. If, sir, there be any who, believing the overthrow of the South in the late civil war to be a conquest and subjugation of the Southern people, shall hope by a policy of repression, of unfriendly action by the Federal Government, to drive from their homes and the homes of their fathers the white race of any one of the Southern States, so that it may become homogeneous in being wholly African, I tell them this will never happen. It will never come to pass that the white people of the South will ever be driven from their ancestral homes, or that remaining there they will be other than they and the race to which they belong have ever been in all parts of the world and in all times, the supreme power in the States they inhabit, working out and responsible for the destinies of these States.

If there be any of the sons of the Southern States so recreant, so forgetful of their history and traditions, full as they are of great examples of self-sacrifice for the common good, so seduced by hopes of personal advancement, so awed by power, as to falter in the discharge of the high duties imposed by perils and dangers, as to so seek shelter for himself from the storm which beats on all others, he will by that act of separation for his individual and personal ends exclude himself from the confidence and companionship of that great mass of Southern men and Southern women, who, whilst yielding a cheerful obedience to the Constitution and laws of the Union, mean for themselves and for their posterity to surrender not one jot or tittle of their inheritance as free men and free-women, or of their just and rightful equality in American citizenship.

IF WAR COME.

Mr. President, I have stated frankly my views on the question before the Senate. "Shall the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of this treaty?" Its pre-ordained rejection I deplore. What will in the end result if, rejecting this wise and just treaty, we are turned over to retaliation, to non-intercourse, to that acerbity of spirit, that inflammation of passions sure to come when two great nations enter into reprisals and contests for superiority in the injuries they can inflict, I know not. If war come, as seems to be desired by some, then, however it may come, on what grounds waged on either side, I shall (and the people of Mississippi will) know only that our country is in danger. Mississippians will not stop to inquire whether by wiser counsels, by more moderation, war might have been averted. They will rally to the support of their country as Mississippians have never failed in the past to do when called to meet a foreign foe. They will hold no conventions to criticise or condemn measures taken by the National Government for defense, nor will they seek to mark with precision a narrow line for the exercise of the military powers of the Constitution. There will not be in all the broad land of the South one single assemblage, one single convention, which, like the Hartford Convention of 1814, sitting with closed doors, will hold high and solemn debate about the conduct of the war. They will hold no convention concerning which it may rightly be said, as was said by John Quincy Adams, in December, 1828, concerning the said convention of 1814—

As he who has hitherto enjoyed unrivaled the honors—

Of being the putative father of the convention—

is now disposed to bestow on others the shame of its paternity. May not the ostensible and the real character of other incidents attending it be alike diversified, so that the main and ultimate object of that assembly, though beaming in splendor from its acts was yet in dim eclipse to the vision of its most distinguished members.

Sir, Senators from New England may raise the absurd and senseless clamor that we who favor the ratification of this treaty are taking the British side; yet if by their folly and perverseness war shall come Mississippi will take that side which she took in the last war with Great Britain. Mississippi was then a Territory. Her population was sparse, most of her fair land being the home of the savage Indian. In December, 1814, when the British fleet had captured or sunk our gunboats on Lake Borgne, when they were pushing their advance on New Orleans through Bayou St. John, and Chef Mentuer, when panic seized the inhabitants of that fair city, fearing that they would be the victims of the diabolical watchwords of the invader, "Booty and Beauty" for the conqueror, Andrew Jackson, undismayed, and relying on the bravery and skill of his army and the patriotism of his countrymen, made, among others, two calls for assistance which that great chieftain knew would be responded to. One of these was for the gallant and brave Tennesseeans, under the command of General Coffee, then at Natchez. How these gallant sons of that gallant State of which Jackson was a citizen, and who in all our wars have so responded to the calls of their country as to have won for their mother the proud title of the Volunteer State, responded to this call, history has recorded on her brightest page. I will not repeat it now.

That other call which Jackson made was on the gallant Colonel Hinds and his squadron of Mississippi Cavalry—the brave soldier in whose honor has been named that imperial county of Mississippi in which her capital is located. He and his squadron responded, too. They hastened to the rescue of the beleaugered city in that manner and spirit that, through forests, thickets, and swamps, crossing rivers, bayous, quagmires, and morasses, in four days from the receipt of the summons from Jackson, marching a distance of 230 miles, they were at the side of that great commander. This march, in celerity of movement, in the hardships and endurance of the men, is unparalleled in history. Only one other case approached it in celerity, and that was the precipitate flight of General Gates and his few attendants from the battle of Camden in 1781, in which, panic adding wings to their feet, they accomplished, in escaping from a pursuing enemy, the distance of 80 miles before the end of the day on which the battle was fought.

As soon as Hinds and his squadron arrived in New Orleans, without rest to recruit men or horses, they became not only the eyes of the commanding general but a strong arm of our forces, making daily sorties, charging the enemy's outposts, and retreating with full information of his position. That squadron of Mississippians so conducted themselves in all the operations about New Orleans, including the great battle of the 8th of January, 1815, as to extort from General Jackson, after one of the hottest engagements, this compliment: "Your undaunted courage this day has excited the admiration of the whole army."

If war shall come, Mississippi will emulate the example of these, her sons. To surpass it is beyond the powers of man.

APPENDIX.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN, 1818.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company:

And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to detain the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who I understand desires to take the floor at this time, especially after having myself occupied so long the attention of the Senate on this subject.

The Senator from Mississippi who has just addressed the Senate, and who declined to be interrupted by an interrogatory during his address, stated that a certain doctrine or argument of his founded upon the distinction between the words "right" and "liberty" in the treaty of 1783 established his position, and he was polite enough to say "beyond honest controversy."

I shall take the earliest convenient opportunity to do what I ought not to interrupt my friend from Oregon to do now—to show that the argument which the Senator from Mississippi has brought forward was abundantly refuted and overthrown and expressly denied by John Quincy Adams, the Secretary of State under whom the treaty of 1818 was negotiated, and by Richard Rush, who wrote, himself, the language in the treaty of 1818 upon which the Senator from Mississippi commented. I will place upon the record of the Senate, after the Senator from Oregon gets through, the narrative of that whole transaction in Mr. Rush's book, "Rush's Occasional Productions," and the narrative of it by John Quincy Adams and his remarks upon Jonathan Russell.

The argument which the Senator from Mississippi has made was made by Jonathan Russell in an attack on John Quincy Adams a few years after the treaty of 1818. It is all there. Mr. Adams answered it with a communication to the public which absolutely pulverized reasoning and reasoner alike. I remember an honored relative of my own who was a member of the House of Representatives telling me that one day John Quincy Adams was in the chair in that body, and John Randolph was addressing the House and sought to describe the condition of somebody who had been thoroughly overthrown and demolished, and with that peculiar gesture of his, pointing to the chair, John Randolph said, "Mr. Chairman, he Jonathan Russelled him."

DISTRICT MILITIA.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Oregon kindly yields to me. I desire to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution which I should be glad to have acted upon immediately, because it will hardly be of use if it should be postponed any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the Senator from Connecticut from the Committee on Military Affairs will be received as in legislative session, if there be no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 161) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue arms and equipments to the militia of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the pending business may be informally laid aside and that the joint resolution be considered as in legislative session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will state the case in a moment.

Mr. DOLPH. I will yield with the understanding that if it leads to debate I may interpose an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have a right to demand the regular order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will state the case very briefly. The Committee on Military Affairs reported favorably a bill to organize the militia of the District of Columbia. It has passed the Senate, and been favorably considered in the House, but it may be impossible to reach it perhaps during this session. In the mean time the House has passed this joint resolution, which will enable some arms, tents, and camp equipage to be issued to that militia for the fall encampment, so that it does not make so much difference whether the regular bill passes now or next December.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The resolution was read at length.

Mr. HAWLEY. A single remark, Mr. President. That is substantially a paragraph of the bill which has passed the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1216) for the investigation of the mining débris question in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith; and

A bill (H. R. 7186) to authorize the Leavenworth and Rio Grande Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 474) for the relief of General G. Cluseret.

EMMA S. FREE.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 431) granting a pension to Emma S. Free, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendment to said bill, and agree to the same.

H. W. BLAIR,
CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDWARD LANE,
JAS. P. WALKER,
E. N. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PADDOCK agrees to this report, but is absent at time of signing.

H. W. BLAIR.

The report was concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9512) for the erection of a public building at Brownsville, Tex., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2197) empowering and directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register and enroll as American vessels certain sailing vessels of foreign construction, repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, and named the Josephine and M. C. Upper, respectively, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. EVARTS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PALMER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1156) to encourage the holding of a national industrial exposition of the arts, mechanics, and products of the colored race throughout the United States of America, to be held in the years 1888 and 1889; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2042) to establish a United States land court and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1695) to provide for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on the Census.

The bill (H. R. 1216) for the investigation of the mining débris question in the State of California was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 7186) to authorize the Leavenworth and Rio Grande Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purpose of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will again resolve itself into open executive session and resume the consideration of the fisheries treaty. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the Senate, under the Constitution, is part of the treaty-making power. In the exercise of its functions in this regard it is independent and should be as free from Executive influence as the Executive in the performance of his purely constitutional duties is free from legislative control. The question of the ratification or rejection of the treaty now before the Senate should be determined solely upon its merits. If it is a fair and proper treaty, by which the rights of the United States are secured and only reasonable concessions made upon matters of honest controversy between the two governments, the Senate should advise and consent to its ratification, if not, it should reject it.

I do not place my opposition to this treaty upon the ground of irregularity in its negotiation. No one has claimed, either in the committee or in the Senate, to my knowledge, that it is not properly before the Senate for consideration upon its merits, and if ratified will not be as valid as if there were no question concerning the official character of the persons who negotiated it on the part of the United States. The resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama in committee did not present that question alone. It was calculated to raise questions not material in the present status of the treaty, and upon which there is room for difference of opinion, and to divert attention from the merits of the treaty. In the committee the motion to lay the resolution on the table was made by myself, not because I did not suppose that the treaty if ratified would be valid and binding, but because I was not willing to say that it had been duly negotiated, and thus approve of the manner of the appointment of the American plenipotentiaries without the advice and consent of the Senate.

It is not my intention to dwell upon the historical facts connected with the question of our fishery rights upon the coasts of British North America, which has largely occupied the attention of our Government for the last seventy years and is still the subject of controversy with Great Britain, and yet as an introduction to what I propose to say concerning the treaty now under consideration a reference to the facts upon which our rights in British waters on these coasts depend and out of which the controversies concerning them have arisen seems desirable.

Prior to the Revolution the inhabitants of the colonies enjoyed in common with all British subjects the right to take and dry fish on the coasts of the British provinces in North America. The glorious struggle which gave birth to a new nation and planted on the shores of the New World a government by the people changed their relations to Great Britain. Whatever rights they gained by that struggle were acquired not by the favor of Great Britain but by force of arms. The struggling colonies achieved independence and secured the rights guarantied to them by the treaty of 1783 by eight years of war waged against them by the powerful Government of Great Britain, conducted in violation of the usages of war and of the laws of humanity. When victory had crowned our arms and peace was about to be declared, our commissioners contended for the fishery rights which had been enjoyed by the inhabitants of the colonies before the war. The British negotiators endeavored to induce them to give up the claim. They refused; Great Britain yielded, and by the third article of the treaty of September 23, 1783, which recognized the independence of the United States, it was agreed—that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and on all other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish, and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island), and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

The right here mentioned to take fish on the banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at sea beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the British possessions was without question an inherent right of the inhabitants of the United States as an independent nation, and derived no additional strength from the stipulation of the treaty. Whether, as has been contended, the liberty recognized by the treaty of the inhabitants of the United States to take fish on the coasts of Newfoundland and on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and the liberty of American fishermen to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks in Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, Labrador, etc., were identical with the possession of land and the demarkation of boundary, and whether the treaty in that respect is analogous to a deed of partition or not, it is certain that these liberties were easements in land servitudes in the British territory permanent in their nature, and were no more affected by subsequent wars between the two nations than was the title to the territory allotted to the United States in the partition of empire by the treaty.

From the ratification of the treaty of 1783 until the war of 1812 there does not appear to have been any controversy concerning the fishery rights recognized and secured to the inhabitants of the colonies by the third article of that treaty. Then came the time when the American people, goaded to desperation by the outrages of Great Britain in enslaving American seamen, in capturing American vessels, and unable to secure by diplomacy, by embargoes, by non-importation laws, non-intercourse laws, liberty for their commerce to exist, determined no longer tamely to submit to British aggressions and declared that the time had come for resistance by all the means which God had placed within their reach. The war of 1812 was fought. Commissioners on the part of the two Governments met and negotiated a treaty of peace. The British commissioners set up the contention that the rights of the United States in the fisheries on the coasts, bays, and creeks of British North America and the right of drying and curing fish on the coasts of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador depended upon the existence of the treaty of 1783, and fell when the treaty was abrogated by war.

The American commissioners maintained that these fishery rights were rights existing previous to the treaty of 1783, had been secured to the United States upon a division of the British Empire, were permanent in their nature, and could no more be lost by the abrogation of all treaties with Great Britain caused by war than our independence, the recognition of which was secured by the same treaty. The American commissioners being without instructions, it was agreed to omit from the treaty all provisions concerning the rights of American citizens to fish in British waters, and the claim of Great Britain of the right of British subjects to navigate the Mississippi. The effect of this omission was to leave the United States in possession of all the rights acknowledged or secured to the colonies by the treaty of 1783, which were of such a permanent nature as not to be affected by subsequent unfriendly relations between the two countries. After peace had been concluded conflicts naturally arose between our fishermen and the British authorities, and our fishery rights under the treaty of 1783 became the subject of a diplomatic correspondence, in which Mr. Adams, on our part, and Earl Bathurst, on the part of Great Britain, ably maintained the views of their respective Governments. Finally, in 1818, Mr. Rush, our minister to England, assisted by Mr. Gallatin, negotiated a treaty, the first article of which was as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company: And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

Great Britain by this treaty succeeded in securing a compromise by which our in-shore fishery rights and our rights upon the shores of British American possessions to dry and cure fish were greatly restricted. We renounced forever those rights upon the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors of the British possessions in North America where it was not stipulated they should continue. The renunciation clause was insisted upon by our commissioners to show that they had not abandoned the grounds upon which their claims surrendered by the treaty rested, and to prevent any implication that the rights not renounced were the subject of a new grant. I think we are agreed upon both sides of this Chamber that by this treaty we surrendered to Great Britain valuable rights. The history of this controversy previous to this period is material to the question now under consideration only as showing the origin and foundation of our present claims to fishery rights within the jurisdiction of the British colonial provinces. No one, so far as I am aware, except the Senator from Alabama, is prepared to advise or vote for the abrogation of the treaty of 1818.

Whatever prior rights of the United States were surrendered by that treaty, after seventy years of acquiesence it would hardly be consistent with the honor and dignity of a great nation to repudiate that treaty and contend for the rights then surrendered. The fishermen of the United States are content to abide by that treaty. I understand that it is the measure of our fishery rights in the waters within the jurisdiction of the Canadian provinces and Newfoundland, and that the only ground for controversy between the two governments concerning these rights is the question of the construction of that treaty.

What are the rights of the United States in British waters recognized by the treaty of 1818? Calling attention again to the fact that the right of the inhabitants of the United States to fish in all parts of the sea outside of British waters, including the banks of Newfoundland and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, is a right not dependent upon either the treaty of 1783 or the treaty of 1818, although recognized by the former, nor upon our rights as subjects of Great Britain prior to the Revolution, but is a natural right possessed in common by the citizens of every independent nation. These rights may be stated as follows:

1. The right of the inhabitants of the United States to fish in the territorial waters of British North America, on the southern coast of Newfoundland, from Cape Ray to the Ramea Islands; on the western and northern coasts of Newfoundland, from Cape Ray to Quirpon Islands; on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador, from Mount Joly eastward through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely.

2. The right to dry and cure fish on any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland and on the coast of Labrador just described, but when the shores become subject to private ownership the right is to be exercised subject to agreement with the shore owners for the use of the shore for such purposes.

3. The rights of American fishermen for shelter, for the purpose of repairing damages, and of obtaining wood and water to enter the bays and harbors on the coasts of British American possessions other than those enumerated above, within the waters of which the inhabitants of the United States have a right to fish.

These rights are permanent rights—easements in British territory which can not be destroyed or impaired by legislation either by Great Britain or her provinces, and can not be lost except by voluntary surrender by the United States or by conquest by a foreign power. The right reserved to our fishing vessels in the treaty of 1818 to enter into the bays and harbors of the British coasts in North America, upon which we by the treaty renounced the right to fish, was purely a fishing right as distinguished from commercial rights, and is incidental to the rights of fishing.

The questions of controversy which have arisen under the fisheries article of the treaty are—

1. As for the line of delimitation of the common waters within which the inhabitants of the United States have a right to fish from the British waters within which the United States renounced the right to take fish; and

2. As to what are reasonable and necessary restrictions to prevent American fishermen from abusing the privileges reserved to them in the waters in which they may not take or cure fish.

The claims of the two Governments concerning the line of delimitation may be stated thus:

Great Britain declares it should be measured 3 miles to the seaward from a line drawn from headland to headland of all bays and gulfs. The United States insists that it should follow the coast and be measured across the mouths of bays only when the distance from headland to headland is 3 miles or less. The diplomatic correspondence concerning this controversy, in my judgment, is not important to a decision of the question under consideration. It will, it is believed, show that the United States has always insisted upon its claim in this regard, and that Great Britain has not, except in a few instances, undertaken to enforce the headland theory. In fact, I can not find that the headland claim was set up until many years after the date of the treaty, or was even attempted to be enforced except in the case of the Washington and the Argus. The regulations and restrictions of American fishing vessels in British waters under laws enacted by provincial legislatures have been the fruitful source of contention.

In 1819 the British Parliament passed a statute concerning the fisheries to carry out the stipulations of the treaty of 1818. Its provisions appear to have been a reasonable exercise of the right reserved by Great Britain to make restrictions concerning the exercise of the privilege secured to our fishermen in British waters by the treaty. From 1819 to 1854 the provincial legislatures passed various laws relating to American fishermen in many respects, as it has always been contended by our Government, in violation of the treaty and abridging the rights of our fishermen. Seizures and confiscations of fishing vessels were made by the provincial authorities for alleged violations of these laws. A recent writer on the subject thus states the grounds of seizure:

1. Fishing within the proscribed limits.
2. Anchoring or hovering in-shore during calm weather without any ostensible cause, having on board ample supplies of wood and water.
3. Lying at anchor and remaining inside of bays to clean and pick fish.
4. Purchasing and bartering bait and preparing to fish.
5. Selling goods and buying supplies.
6. Landing and transshipping cargoes of fish.

The seizures made for alleged infractions of the provisions of these laws, which were in violation of the treaty rights of our citizens, no doubt constitute the foundation of just claims against Great Britain. Some claims on account of such seizures were submitted to and determined by the commission provided for in the convention of 1854. There appears to me to be no reason why all other claims of a similar character should not be submitted to a commission and determined in the same manner. The consideration of these claims would involve the question of the territorial limit of our fishing rights, the reasonableness and legality of the restrictions made by the provincial statutes upon the exercise of the liberties of American fishermen in British waters secured by the treaty of 1818, as well as the merits of the claims on the facts of each case. To the extent that the laws under which the seizures were made relate to commercial privileges, as distinguished from the fishing rights of our vessels under the treaty, seizures of American vessels for infractions of them, in my judgment, do not constitute the foundation of a legal claim for reparation against Great Britain. I suppose it was competent for Great Britain, and the provinces also, to the extent of their legislative power, to repeal at any time the order in council by which American ships were admitted to commercial privileges in the ports of the British possessions of North America.

The United States had the same power at any time to discontinue the arrangement made in 1830 for reciprocal commercial privileges and to deny British vessels admission to our ports. And to the extent that the British provinces at any time have denied to our fishing vessels or vessels of any class commercial privileges, the dignity and honor of the United States demanded that the vessels of such provinces should have been denied commercial privileges in our ports.

Under the reciprocity treaty of 1854, in addition to the liberty of taking and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American possessions, secured to the inhabitants of the United States under the treaty of 1818, it was agreed that the inhabitants of the United States should have the liberty to take fish of every kind except shell-fish on the seacoasts and shores and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and of the several adjacent islands, without being restricted to any distance from the shore; also to land on such coasts, etc., for the purpose of drying nets and curing fish, but not so as to interfere with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the prior use of any part of said coasts. And like privileges were granted to British subjects upon the coasts, bays, harbors, etc., of the United States north of the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude. As by this treaty fish and products of fish and most agricultural and mineral products of each country were admitted into the other free of duty, there was a cessation of the aggressive acts of the provincial authorities against our fishing vessels, but upon the abrogation of this treaty in 1866 they were renewed, together with the complaints of our fishermen. The Dominion of Canada by an act of Parliament passed May 22, 1868, and amended in 1870, revised the laws of the provincial governments, and the governor-general of Canada made an order that thenceforth "all foreign fishermen shall be prevented from fishing in the waters of Canada."

Against these palpable violations of our treaty rights our Secretary of State vigorously protested. Then followed the treaty of 1871 for the settlement of the Alabama claims, and by which for a period of ten years and for two years after notice by either of the contracting parties the article of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 granting to our fishermen the right to take fish on the coasts of the British North American possessions and granting to British subjects the right to fish on the eastern seacoast and shores of the United States north of 39° of north latitude was renewed, and it was provided that for the term of years mentioned—

> Fish oil and fish of all kinds except fish of the inland lakes and rivers falling into them and except fish preserved in oil, being the produce of the fisheries of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward's Island, shall be admitted into each country respectively free of duty.

It was agreed that the claim asserted by Great Britain, but not admitted by the United States, that the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States were greater in value than those accorded by the United States to British subjects should be submitted to commissioners, who should determine what compensation ought to be paid by the United States to Great Britain, if any. This commission met at Halifax in 1877. The commission disagreed, but the umpire, Mr. Delfosse, the Belgian minister at Washington, decided that the United States should pay to Great Britain the sum of $5,500,000. This arrangement cost us over $10,000,000—$5,500,000 in cash and from five to six millions in remitted duties on fish and fish oil. The United States Government, after payment of the money before the treaty expired, became so thoroughly convinced that the arrangement was not beneficial to us that it offered to terminate it, but the British Government would not consent.

We terminated the treaty at the earliest possible moment and found that we had not only paid over $10,000,000 for the privilege of catching $700,000 worth of fish, but by the admission of Canadian fish free had built up the fishing interests of Canada and had nearly destroyed our own. Canadian fish being no longer admitted into the United States free, the Canadian authorities commenced the old tactics to secure a free market in the United States for their fish and fishery products. I shall not enumerate the outrages perpetrated upon our fishermen, the seizures and confiscations of their vessels, the fines, insults, and indignities heaped upon them. The report of the minority of the committee contains a long list of them. The common rights of humanity were denied to our fishermen in distress. Upon one pretense and another our fishing vessels were seized and fined or confiscated, and in one instance the American flag was insolently hauled down from the masthead of an American vessel by a British officer. For my purpose the utterances of the present Secretary of State and of our minister to Great Britain are sufficient. The character of these proceedings on the part of the Canadian Government will appear from the following quotations, which might be multiplied indefinitely. Mr. Phelps, our minister to England, in a letter to Lord Roseberry, dated June 2, 1886, concerning the seizure of the David J. Adams, said:

From all the circumstances attending this case, and other recent cases like it, it seems to me very apparent that the seizure was not made for the purpose of enforcing any right or redressing any wrong. As I have before remarked, it is not pretended that the vessel had been engaged in fishing, or was intending to fish in the prohibited waters, or that it had done or was intending to do any other injurious act. It was proceeding upon its regular and lawful business of fishing in the deep sea. It had received no request, and of course could have disregarded no request, to depart, and was, in fact, departing when seized; nor had its master refused to answer any questions put by the authorities. It had violated no existing law, and had incurred no penalty that any known statute imposed.

It seems to me impossible to escape the conclusion that this and other similar seizures were made by the Canadian authorities for the deliberate purpose of harassing and embarrassing the American fishing vessels in the pursuit of their lawful employment. And the injury, which would have been a serious one if committed under a mistake, is very much aggravated by the motives which appear to have prompted it.

I am instructed by my Government earnestly to protest against these proceedings as wholly unwarranted by the treaty of 1818, and altogether inconsistent with the friendly relations hitherto existing between the United States and Her Majesty's Government; to request that the David J. Adams, and the other American fishing vessels now under seizure in Canadian ports, be immediately released, and that proper orders may be issued to prevent similar proceedings in the future. And I am also instructed to inform you that the United States will hold Her Majesty's Government responsible for all losses which may be sustained by American citizens in the dispossession of their property growing out of the search, seizure, detention, or sale of their vessels lawfully within the territorial waters of British North America.

Mr. Bayard, in a communication to Sir Lionel West, the British minister, dated May 20, 1886, said:

And I should fail in my duty if I did not endeavor to impress you with my sense of the absolute and instant necessity that now exists for a restriction of the seizure of American vessels charged with violations of the treaty of 1818 to the conditions announced by Sir Edward Thornton to this Government in June, 1870.

Again, May 29, 1886:

Such proceedings I conceive to be flagrantly violative of the reciprocal commercial privileges to which citizens of the United States are lawfully entitled under the statutes of Great Britain and the well-defined and publicly proclaimed authority of both countries, besides being, in respect of the existing conventions between the two countries, an assumption of jurisdiction entirely unwarranted and which is wholly denied by the United States.

On June 7, 1886:

I earnestly protest against this unwarranted withholding of lawful commercial privileges from an American vessel and her owners, and for the loss and damage consequent thereon the Government of Great Britain will be held liable.

On July 10, 1886:

Against this treatment I make instant and formal protest as an unwarranted interpretation and application of the treaty by the officers of the Dominion of Canada and the province of Nova Scotia, as an infraction of the laws of commercial and maritime intercourse existing between the two countries and as a violation of hospitality, and for any loss or injury resulting therefrom the Government of Her Britannic Majesty will be held liable.

On July 30, 1886:

These are flagrant violations of treaty rights of their citizens for which the United States expect prompt remedial action by Her Majesty's Government, and I have to ask that such instructions be issued forthwith to the provincial officials of Newfoundland and of the Magdalen Islands as will cause the treaty rights of the citizens of the United States to be respected.

Notwithstanding these strong patriotic utterances of Mr. Bayard and Mr. Phelps, a treaty is presented to the Senate for ratification which, in my judgment, surrenders the American position concerning bays and harbors and the clear rights of our fishermen in British waters under the treaty of 1818; surrenders our claim for commercial reciprocity, and contains a stipulation that if our fishing vessels are granted even partial commercial privileges in Canadian ports we must purchase them with free fish and fish-oil; and no provision is made for determining the rights of our fishermen and securing for them reparation from Great Britain for the seizure and confiscation of their vessels and for other outrages which Mr. Bayard less than two years ago said were flagrant violations of the treaty rights of our citizens. Instead of, as Mr. Phelps, in accordance with his instructions, informed Lord Rosebery would be done, holding—

Her Majesty's Government responsible for all losses * * * sustained by American citizens in the disposition of their property growing out of search and seizure, detention and sale of their vessels lawfully within the territorial waters of British North America—the Administration now propose by this treaty to surrender a large part, at least the grounds, of our claims as to territory and our contention as to commercial rights and to submit to regulations in clear derogation of the rights of our fishing vessels in British bays and harbors under the treaty of 1818. The purpose for which these outrages are committed can not be misunderstood. Mr. Phelps, our minister to England, in his letter to Lord Rosebery, before referred to, concerning the seizure of the David J. Adams, said:

The real source of the difficulty that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty remained in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

It is not necessary to say that this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle. In terminating the treaty of Washington the United States were simply exercising a right expressly reserved to both parties by the treaties itself, and of the exercise of which by either party neither can complain. They will not be coerced by wanton injury into the making of a new one. Nor would a negotiation that had its origin in mutual irritation be promising of success. The question now is, not what fresh treaty may or might be desirable, but what is the true and just construction, as between the two nations, of the treaty that already exists.

The Government of the United States, approaching this question in the most friendly spirit, can not doubt that it will be met by Her Majesty's Government in the same spirit, and feels every confidence that the action of Her Majesty's Government in the premises will be such as to maintain the cordial relations between the two countries that have so long happily prevailed.

The Senator from Alabama in his recent speech in the Senate upon the fisheries treaty said:

I did not say in the Senate, as I say now, that every trouble that had arisen, or will arise, under the treaty of 1818, would disappear the moment Congress shall repeal the duty on fish. In this opinion I am sure I must have the concurrence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Why did I not then speak out on that question? It was because we were then dealing in the Senate with Great Britain, and not with differences of opinion on domestic questions, and I thought it hardly fair to add even my feeble influence to stimulate the hope of Great Britain for a free market for fish. I want that duty repealed for many reasons, the chief one being that it will lower the price and increase the supply of food to the great body of our industrial classes.

The denial of commercial privileges to our fishing vessels in the ports of British-American possessions is not because the purchase of provisions, supplies, and outfits in such ports would not be beneficial to the merchants and traders of those provinces, but for the purpose of benefiting a more important industrial industry of the Dominion, by placing our fishermen in the prosecution of the open-sea fisheries at a disadvantage with Canadian fishermen and building up Canadian fishing interests, and for the further purpose, as it is supposed, of being able to barter such commercial privileges for the admission into the United States of Canadian fish free of duty.

That under the mutual arrangement between the United States and Great Britain of 1830 our ships were entitled to full commercial privileges in the ports of British North America there can be no doubt. Under the proclamation of President Jackson, issued the 5th of October, 1830, in pursuance of the previous act of Congress of May 29, 1830—

British vessels and their cargoes are admitted to entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain on or near the American continent, and north or east of the United States.

And in the order in council made at the court of St. James November 5, 1830, it is declared—

That the ships of and belonging to the United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid into the British possessions abroad goods, the produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad, to be carried to any foreign country whatever.

But if this were not so, as the rights of Canadian vessels in our ports are dependent wholly upon our legislation, which it is entirely competent for us to modify or repeal at any time, our duty to our fishermen and our own self-respect demand that either our ships of every class shall be admitted to full commercial privileges in the ports of the Canadian provinces or that the commercial rights withheld from any of our ships by the laws of such provinces shall be withheld from the vessels of such provinces in the ports of the United States. To follow the example of the Senator from Maine and quote from the most remarkable discourse on record, if in this regard we shall say to our Canadian friends:

For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again—

We can not go far wrong.

There is nothing new nor extraordinary in such a course. It has been the practice of Congress since the organization of the Government. Several acts of the character mentioned have been passed concerning our commercial intercourse with Great Britain.

By an act entitled "An act concerning navigation," approved April 18, 1818, the ports of the United States were closed after the 30th of September, 1818, against vessels owned by British subjects arriving from any port or place in a colony or territory of His British Majesty which by the ordinary laws was closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States. Vessels and cargoes entering the ports of the United States in violation of the act were declared to be forfeited to the United States, and the owners, consignees, or agents of British vessels taking on board productions of the United States in the ports thereof, except sea stores, were required to give bond not to land them in any British colony or territory from which by the ordinary laws vessels of the United States were excluded.

By an act of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act concerning navigation,'" approved May 15, 1820, it was provided that after the 30th day of September of the same year the ports of the United States should be and remain closed against vessels owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving by sea from any port or place in the province of Lower Canada, in the province of New Brunswick, in the province of Nova Scotia, islands of Newfoundland, St. John's, or Cape Breton, or the dependencies of any of them, and from certain other ports named. Bonds were required to be given by the owners, consignees, or agents of British vessels laden with articles the growth of the United States for exportation not to land them in the prohibited places; and it was further provided that no goods, wares, or merchandise should be imported from the prohibited place except they were wholly of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the colony where laden and whence directly imported, and for a violation of the provisions of the act the vessel and cargo were to be forfeited.

By an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," approved March 1, 1823, the provisions of the first, second, and third sections of the acts of April 18, 1818, and May 15, 1820, were suspended so far as they related to certain British ports, among which were St. John's and St. Andrew's in New Brunswick, Halifax in Nova Scotia, Quebec in Canada, St. John's in Newfoundland, and the ports of the United States, from and after the 3d day of March following, were declared to be open to British vessels coming directly from such British colonial ports; but by the sixth section of the act it was provided that unless repealed, altered, or amended by Congress it should continue in force so long as the British colonial ports mentioned should be open to the admission of vessels of the United States conformably to the provisions of the British act of Parliament of the 24th of June preceding. But if at any time the trade and intercourse between the United States and all or any of the British colonial ports enumerated in the act should be prohibited by a British order in council or by an act of Parliament, then from the day of the date of such order in council or act of Parliament, or from the time that the same should commence to be in force, proclamation to that effect having been made by the President of the United States, each and every provision of the act, so far as the same applied to the intercourse between the United States and the enumerated British colonial ports in British vessels, should cease to operate in their favor.

By an act of Congress passed the 29th day of May, 1830, which provided that whenever the President of the United States should receive satisfactory evidence that the Government of Great Britain would open the ports of certain colonial possessions to the vessels of the United States for an indefinite or limited term, he was authorized in the recess of Congress to issue his proclamation declaring that he had received such evidence, and from the date of such proclamation the ports of the United States should be opened indefinitely or for a term fixed, as the case might be. Under the provisions of this act Andrew Jackson, then President of the United States, on the 5th day of October, 1830, issued the proclamation before referred to, in which he declared that the acts of April 18, 1818, May 15, 1820, and March 1, 1823, were repealed and British vessels and their cargoes were admitted in ports of the United States from the provinces of Great Britain north or east of the United States.

Such a course has been authorized by Congress. By an act of Congress passed in the Senate by a vote of 46 in the affirmative to 1 in the negative, and in the House by a vote of 256 in the affirmative to 1 in the negative, and approved March 3, 1887, it is provided—

That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are then or lately have [been] unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies, as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments in the discretion of the court. Approved March 3, 1887.

No member of either House of Congress appeared to think at the time this act was passed that the unconditional surrender of our fishery rights in whole or in part, and the purchase of partial commercial privileges for our fishing vessels by the surrender of a million dollars of revenue annually, was necessary to prevent a war with Great Britain. Such a proposition advanced by a member of the Senate or of the House would have been hailed with derision. The Senator from Alabama, who, I believe, in discussing the report of the Senate conferees upon the disagreement of the two Houses upon the House amendments to this bill, gave expression to the views of the other side of this Chamber at that time, did not appear to think that such retaliation as is provided for in this act would lead to war. I will quote from his remarks to show what he thought at that time as to the propriety of such legislation:

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee who reported this bill, and it received my cordial approbation. I was also a member of the subcommittee which formulated the bill, and it was carefully considered there in connection with the evidence which had been collected, not only from their own investigations under the order of the Senate, but also from the archives of the State Department as far as we had access to those archives.

After that committee had entered upon its work, and before it was ready to make its report, the Secretary of State sent a communication to the Senate in which was developed at large correspondence on this subject; and I had the happiness to find that the committee and the Secretary of State, without any division of party at all, were entirely agreed in their views of the conduct of the British provinces and of the British Government towards our Government in respect of this very important and very delicate matter.

The committee in preparing the bill and bringing it forward into the Senate first took into consideration what was the actual condition of the treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain respecting the British provinces in North America, and a very close, narrow investigation of the whole field of inquiry satisfied us that we were entirely without treaty engagements with Great Britain in respect of our commerce with the Canadian Dominion. It is true that in the treaty of Washington we have mutual stipulations in respect of transportation, liable to be suspended, I believe, upon two years' notice or upon the failure of either government to carry out in good faith, according to the opinion of the other government, the provisions of those mutual stipulations. But the Senate will do well to remember in approaching this question and in deciding what is its duty in respect of it that the United States have no commercial engagements with Great Britain with reference to our commerce with the Canadian provinces. Our engagements are limited to what I have already stated and to the treaty of 1818 relating to the fisheries. The relations between the United States and the provinces of Canada depend entirely upon the statutes of the two countries, and not upon any treaty engagements; so that in legislating upon this question we have an open field in which we are permitted to exercise our own sweet will without question on the part of Great Britain. We can establish by act of Congress any of the ordinances that we see proper for the regulation of our commercial relations with those provinces, and so they can do the same thing.

When two countries, thus neighbors to each other, are thus situated in respect of their treaty obligations and are left only to provide for their mutual interests by legislation, it is very clear that if the Dominion of Canada, backed by the Government of Great Britain, shall legislate in hostility to our trade it becomes not only our duty but our only alternative to legislate in hostility to theirs, to legislate according to the principles of retrosion and retaliation, if you please.

The Senator from Kansas was anxious to know whether the committee proposed to go to war. About what should we go to war? Not, certainly, on account of the breach of any commercial treaty with Great Britain in respect of the Canadian provinces, for we have not got any. It would be a war of words, necessarily followed by a war of acts of a commercial character simply, if we should have a war, for there is to be no broken engagements brought to the attention of any government in consequence of the conduct either of Great Britain or of our Government upon these questions, unless it may be that some rights which have been guaranteed to our fishermen in the treaty of 1818, not commercial rights, but fishery rights, shall have been violated by the Canadian Government or by ourselves.

The treaty of 1818 is the real point of dispute between us—the construction of it, the question of its proper enforcement, and the question of the responsibility of the British Government for the acts of the Dominion in regard to that treaty. That is the real bone of controversy between us to-day, and it is about that which we differ. We are undertaking to improve our condition in respect of our differences on that subject, and other commercial questions between us and Great Britain or the Canadian provinces, by the reformation of our statutes, so as to give to our own Government by the authority of Congress under the sanctions of law that degree of power which is necessary to enable our Government to protect itself and to protect its people against aggressive acts on the part of the Canadian provinces or the Government of Great Britain, as you please. That is all of it.

This is not a new sort of legislation on our statute-books. We have had many acts on the general subject, and we have some general laws, which I find in the Revised Statutes, based precisely upon the principle of this measure. I call attention to section 4228 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Upon satisfactory proof being given to the President, by the government of any foreign nation, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or imposts are imposed or levied in the ports of such nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country, the President may issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are suspended and discontinued—"

That is, a duty of 10 per cent.—

"so far as respects the vessels of such foreign nation, and the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported into the United States from such foreign nation, or from any other foreign country; the suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States, and their cargoes, shall be continued, and no longer."

There is the whole principle of this bill. It is put in a different form in that enactment, but only in a different form; the principle is precisely the same. Suppose that we should enact a law to-day in Congress that there should be no commercial intercourse between the ports of the United States and of Canada, but that the President of the United States might suspend that law and permit commercial intercourse between the two countries whenever it was made satisfactorily to appear to him that our fishermen upon the coasts of Canada were received with hospitality and treated with humanity. That would be a constitutional law, and it would be a wise provision, but the Committee on Foreign Relations have not thought it best to advise the Government of the United States to come to a positive determination of law in advance that there should be no intercourse, and allow the President to suspend that law at his pleasure; but the committee prefer to give the President power to suspend as to certain articles or as to any importation of their goods, based upon satisfactory evidence brought to his attention that that Government have treated our men of commerce and our fishermen also with injustice upon their coasts, and have harassed and detained and imprisoned and insulted both them and the flag under which they sailed. So this is not a novel principle in the Government by any means, nor is it novel in respect of this particular question.

General Grant, in his annual message in 1870, made the following recommendation:

"Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeal their unneighborly acts toward our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of the laws authorizing the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada."

Going further than this bill goes—

"And further, should such an extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States."

That was a faithful declaration of American policy based upon American honor by a man who had proper respect for it, and I honor him in his grave for the fact that he did anticipate the hour of trouble that we now approach, and forestalled it by that wise and manly declaration in his message of 1870 to Congress.

So this is not a new question at all; it is not a question that has not been under consideration heretofore. Congress in its efforts last year to provide a law by which this subject could be reached merely failed to go far enough to accomplish the end that was intended. The legislation in this bill is precisely in the line of that proposed in the last Congress, and which was passed by both Houses, that not going far enough to reach the evil which we now have to confront.

Under these circumstances would the Senate of the United States be content to leave the President of the United States without power enough to control the commercial intercourse and regulation between this country and the Dominion of Canada so as to produce an equilibrium or a parallelism, to say the least of it, between the rights and privileges that they enjoy in our ports and harbors and those that we enjoy in theirs? I can scarcely think that we should not be otherwise than delinquent in our duty if we omitted to arm the President of the United States with the only power which appears now to be effectual for the purpose of producing this mutuality of benefit and advantage and freedom in trade between these two countries. Our Government is not now equipped with power enough under the statutes to do that which is becoming to our honor and to our interests and the protection of the individual men of our country engaged in this lawful traffic, and also engaged in a higher duty even than that—preparing themselves to become the chief element of strength in the great naval enterprises which we expect in the future to establish in this country. I am not willing to remain any longer in a condition of impotence and disability when I know that the power to confer this authority upon the only person in the United States who can properly exercise it rests in the hands of Congress, and not in the hands of the treaty-making power.

Great Britian can baffle us as long as she pleases by saying she will make no commercial engagements with us respecting Canada. "We have none to improve; we have none to interpret; we sit down on our own interpretation of this fisheries matter, and we intend to stand upon it; but so far as you are concerned you have no engagement of ours by which you can coerce us to do any better than we have been doing in the past in respect of the interest and honor and liberty and rights of your people." That is not the condition in which our country ought to be left. Patriotism forbids it; duty to the country and to posterity alike forbid it.

Some question has been raised here as to the purpose of the committee in reporting the bill. The Senator from Kansas seemed anxious indeed to ascertain whether the committee were going to bring the country into war, and I have had Democratic Senators question me about that who desired to know whether the committee were about to make a declaration of war against Great Britain. Can we not in the quietude of our own country and in the repose which attends this Chamber pass laws affecting our own commerce without making threats against any person in the world? It would not be becoming in us to make threats, nor is it necessary. When our resolutions are reached we are strong enough in the expression of them to convey to the world at large the idea that we mean what we say.

Sir, I do not see how the Government of Great Britain could address a note to our Department of State inquiring into the motive of this legislation any more than the Government of Spain or the Government of Prussia could address a note to our Secretary of State to inquire why it was we spread out upon the statute-books discriminations against them in their commerce and their tonnage and their ships, which should remain until the President of the United States should lift them by a proclamation. It has been but a few months since we had a controversy with Spain over this very question. We had a little convention, or rather a sort of agreement with her not amounting to a treaty, entered into between the executive powers of the two Governments, by which more liberal terms of commercial intercommunication were permitted between Cuba and the other Caribbean possessions of Spain and the United States.

After a while the President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, became satisfied that Spain was not observing good faith in the execution of that agreement, and thereupon immediately he restored, by his proclamation, discriminating duties against the flag of Spain. Afterwards, when Spain came and made acknowledgment of her mistaken action and removed the difficulty, the President made another proclamation in which he restored Spain to the favor that she was entitled to under that little agreement. So it is, whipping back and forth, that this power in the hands of the President of the United States is a necessary power to preserve the balance of commercial differences between countries, and that we can not abandon that as a part of our statutory system without crippling our own Government. The Committee on Foreign Relations, at least, do not propose to abandon it; but they come now to apply it in a case which in its nature is delicate, I admit, and somewhat provoking to American pride and American honor and duty.

I will read from Mr. Phelps's letter of date of June 2, 1886, to Lord Rosebery. My purpose in reading this is simply to show that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations is scarcely up in the vigor of its language and in the heat of its argumentation to what Mr. Phelps said in his direct address on this question to Lord Rosebery. I shall commence with reading the latter clause of his dispatch first to answer some interrogatory or suggestion that has been put here to-day in respect of the purposes of the British Government and the Canadian Government in this series of unlawful acts which, taking the liberty that the Secretary of the Treasury indulged in, I am permitted on the floor of the Senate to call brutal, without any offense I think to the ears of Senators or to British susceptibilities. Here was a plain, positive, direct man, speaking like an American ought to speak upon a question of this kind.

The Senator then quotes from Mr. Phelps's letter to Lord Rosebery, portions of which I have already read.

He then continues:

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in order to show further that this committee is in a line with the present Administration, I will read an extract from the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1886, calling for an interpretation of the tariff laws respecting the duties on fish. On page 13 of his report the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"During the past summer, while American vessels, regularly documented, have been excluded from the hospitality and privileges of trading in Canadian ports, Canadian fishing vessels have been permitted freely to enter and use American ports along the New England coast, have been protected by this Department in such entry and use, and have not been required to pay any other fees, charges, taxes, or dues than have been imposed upon the vessels of other governments similarly situated. The hospitality elsewhere and generally extended in British ports to American commercial vessels has not been less, in quality or quantity, as I am informed, than the hospitality extended to British vessels in American ports; but there is this marked difference, that while this Department protects Canadian fishermen in the use of American ports, the Dominion of Canada brutally excludes American fishermen from Canadian ports. This dependence of port hospitality, as between this Government and the British Government, in respect to vessels of either, is emphasized by the seventeenth section of the law of June 19, 1886, empowering the President to suspend commercial privileges to the vessels of any country denying the same to United States vessels. That section is in harmony with a section in the British navigation law which authorizes the Queen, whenever British vessels are subject in any foreign country to prohibitions or restrictions, to impose by order in council such prohibitions or restrictions upon the ships of such foreign country, either as to voyages in which they may engage or as to the articles which they may import into or export from any British possession in any part of the world, so as to place the ships of such country on as nearly as possible the same footing in British ports as that on which British ships are placed in ports of such country."

There is a statement of the whole doctrine; there is a statement of the necessity of mutual legislation on the part of each power to provide the necessary means of keeping up or preserving the equilibrium of our commercial intercourse in respect of the privileges of the ports and otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to say that that was stated in the discussion in the Senate on the very law to which the Secretary refers, and has been stated all the time, and was in the bill passed by the Senate in respect of the export of meats, etc., which was sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. I remember very well the Senate passed a bill reported by the lamented Senator from California, Mr. Miller, and that bill was distinctly predicated on the idea that in France and in Germany our American meats were excluded from their markets, or discriminations against them were made continually, to the detriment of our own people, upon pretended complaints as to the quality of the meat, etc. Thereupon the Senate passed that bill, after due consideration, authorizing the President of the United States, in case the discrimination should appear to be not genuine and honest and sincere, but from some motives of local policy, to retaliate by excluding their sugars, or whatever it was that we put in the retaliatory clause of the bill; I do not now remember what.

I do not understand that there has been at any time since I have had the honor of being a member of this body any difference of opinion among Senators upon the question of the right and duty of the American Government to provide laws that the President of the United States might exercise this species of retaliation, if you please to call it such, in our commercial intercourse with foreign countries. So far from its being a warlike measure, it is a measure to prevent war. If we should to-day declare war, as we have the right to declare that the British Government have violated the treaty of 1818, that it was a casus belli, and that it was our duty so to treat it, we should bring these two countries by the ears in a very savage way, to the expenditure of much treasure and blood. But the Senate of the United States and the Committee on Foreign Relations do not think of entering upon that ground.

Let the facts that may possibly compel or justify such a procedure as that rest where they are now, in the womb of the future, and probably American policy, and statesmanship, and resolution, and material will be quite sufficient to meet each emergency as it may arise. But this committee are acting in the most peaceful way, on the side of peace, so as to furnish opportunities by which our Government may call the Government of Great Britain to pause and reflect upon the question, first, "How much is this going to damage your commerce? How much is this going to cut you off from the profits of the rich and convenient trade with the people of the United States? Perhaps after you have duly weighed that question under the influence of a positive example set by a proclamation of a President of the United States relating to fish, then you will have sufficiently recovered your composure to deal with us in a more friendly, if not fraternal, spirit than you have been doing."

We want to interpose an opportunity for cool reflection on the part of these governments, directed to their commercial interests, and addressed to the sound sense of the commercial men who control these countries. It will not be necessary that the President of the United States shall issue a proclamation of embargo or a proclamation of entire suspension of commercial relations with the Canadian provinces or any other part of Great Britain.

I am quite satisfied that when the Canadian fishermen find that they have got no market in the United States for a pound of their fish and can not afford to carry them across the Atlantic Ocean or the Pacific Ocean to foreign markets, they will at once consult the great moving power of nations and of men, the pocket nerve; they will find that quite influential enough to arrange all of their disputes and difficulties without resorting to the muscles and nerve of the right arm of power, the war-making power.

Mr. President, contrast this dignified, vigorous, and patriotic speech of the Senator from Alabama, made but a little over a year ago, with the complaints now made concerning the course of the majority in the Senate in discussing this treaty in open sessions, with the charge that the adherence of the majority to the position of the Senate and House of a year ago on this queseion is for political purposes, with the intimations which have been made by Senators upon this floor that if this treaty is not ratified the President will enforce the law, so ably advocated by the Senator from Alabama a year ago last March, in such a manner as to ruin the industries of the country and bankrupt our people, and that if we reject this treaty and refuse to surrender all that we have been contending for in this matter there is danger of war with Great Britain.

Which side of this Chamber is influenced in its action upon this treaty by political considerations? How are we to account for the sudden change in the position of the Senator from Alabama? What has put the British arguments as to the construction of the treaty of 1818 into the mouths of the honorable Senators on the other side of this Chamber? Politics! The decree has gone forth that the State Department and the Administration must be sustained in this matter. The man of destiny who occupies the White House and rules the Democratic party at his own will, crooked his finger and the Senators who were in favor of commercial retaliation a year ago have turned a complete somersault and endeavor to obscure the real question at issue by allusions to caucus agreements and charges that the course of the Republican Senators concerning this treaty is dictated by political considerations.

This was the attitude of the United States, deliberately taken by the legislative department one year ago. We stood on the treaty of 1818 as the measure of our fishery rights in British waters, including the incidental rights of our fishing vessels to resort for certain purposes to the bays and harbors of the British American coasts, as to which we had renounced the right to fish. We had determined on giving to Canadian vessels the same commercial rights in our ports that vessels of the United States were accorded in Canadian ports and no more, and placed the power in the hands of the President to regulate such rights. We placed in the hands of the President power, by prohibiting the entry of Canadian fish, to retaliate for the cruel and unjust treatment of our fishermen in Canadian waters. The only thing left to be done was to demand of Great Britain indemnity for the seizure of our fishing vessels, in violation of the treaty of 1818, and for the President to enforce the power placed in his hands.

Instead of that this treaty was negotiated, by which, if it is ratified, we will yield substantially all that Great Britain has ever claimed and surrender our claim for reciprocal commercial privileges.

It is not my purpose to enter into a critical review of the treaty. Others better qualified for the task have done that. I will briefly refer to the salient features of it.

The first eight articles of the treaty relate to the delimitation, by a commission, of the British waters, bays, creeks, and harbors upon the coasts of Canada and Newfoundland as to which the United States, by the treaty of 1818, renounced the liberty theretofore enjoyed by its citizens to take, cure, or dry fish. The question of what these waters are is not submitted to the commission, but the treaty prescribes the rules by which the delimitation is to be made, leaving the commission the formal task of marking the lines of delimitation upon the British admiralty charts.

By Article III of the treaty, if ratified, the United States will surrender the right to fish within a line 3 miles seaward from all bays, creeks, and harbors, 10 miles or less in width, along the coasts upon which we renounced the right to fish by the treaty of 1818.

By Article IV of the treaty, at or near the following large bays the limits of exclusion are established by fixed lines, and the United States surrender the right of fishing in bays of much greater width than 10 miles, namely, Bay Chaleur, Bay Miramichi, Egmont Bay, Fortune Bay, and Sir Charles Hamilton Sound.

The limits of exclusion at or near Barrington Bay and at Chedabucto and St. Peter's Bays, at Mira Bay, and at Plancentia Bay are fixed at 3 marine miles seaward from fixed lines, and the United States surrenders the right of fishing in bays of 20 miles and more in width at the limits of exclusion.

By the fifth article of the treaty all such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as can not be reached from the sea without passing within 3 marine miles of the shores, no matter what the width of the channel may be, are excluded from the common waters.

These provisions, if not substantially a recognition of the British headland theory, are a voluntary surrender of our claims upon the question of what are British bays and harbors under the provisions of the treaty of 1818, after seventy years of stout contention under all administrations, in the face of an almost unanimous agreement of modern authorities that our contention is correct, and of an adjudication in our favor.

The owners of the American vessel, Washington, seized in 1843, while fishing in the Bay of Fundy 10 miles from land and confiscated, presented their claim for reparation to the commission provided for in the convention of 1854 between the United States and Great Britain, alleging that the seizure and confiscation were illegal. The commission disagreed, and the umpire decided that the Bay of Fundy was not a British bay or a bay at all within the meaning of the treaty. This decision covers the whole ground in controversy, and necessarily sustains the American construction of the treaty. It effectually disposes of the headland theory.

The same commission passed upon the claim of the owners of the Argus, seized off Cape Breton and within the points of extreme headlands, and held the seizure to have been illegal. The headland theory being disposed of, in my judgment there is nothing left of the British claim to exclude our fishermen from the bays, creeks, and harbors more than 6 miles wide. The open sea is free to all and can not be brought under the dominion of any one nation. Its physical nature is such that it can not be possessed, and can not therefore become property. It is a public highway for all nations. Parts of the sea, however, are subject to municipal jurisdiction and belong to the territory of the countries whose coasts they wash. This jurisdiction rests upon the principle that each state, in order to defend its coasts, is entitled to jurisdiction seaward to the extent of its ability to maintain it from the shore. Upon this principle the jurisdiction of a nation seaward from its coasts is a variable jurisdiction, and was not, at the time the treaty of 1818 was made, as extensive as it is to-day. Jurisdiction over the sea based upon the ability of a nation to assert and maintain it in the earlier history of mankind would have extended the distance of a stone's throw from shore, then an arrow's flight, then the distance of a cannon shot, which at the date of the treaty of 1818 was by the common consent of mankind one marine league. Logically, upon the same principle it should now be extended to the distance covered by the effective range of modern steel rifles. The rules of international law at the time the treaty of 1818 was made entered into and became a part of it. The true interpretation of the renunciatory clause of the treaty by which the United States surrendered the right of fishing within 3 marine miles of certain coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors must be determined by ascertaining what the rule of international law as to the jurisdiction of a state over the adjacent sea was at the time the treaty was negotiated. The treaty was evidently a declaration of the rule of international law. I find this question so admirably discussed in the American Law Review for April, 1871, that I am constrained to quote from it. The writer says:

> The clause of the treaty of 1818, establishing the territorial line at 3 marine miles distant from "any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" of the provinces, was evidently intended to be, and must be considered as declaratory of the international law. If we can, therefore, discover and state with accuracy the doctrines and rules of that law, we shall have found the correct interpretation of the convention. Parts of the sea are under the municipal jurisdiction and belong to the territory of the countries whose coasts they wash. These portions are, for reasons stated hereafter, bounded exteriorly by the range of cannon shot projected from the land, which distance, for purposes of certainty, has generally been taken at 3 marine miles. This external sea limit of territorial dominion does not, however, follow the shore parallel to all the sinuosities of the low-water mark; it is measured at the established distance from point or headland to point or headland, where these projections do not alter or break the trend of the coast, and is thus carried around the mouths of those small depressions or bays whose openings are not wider than the double range of cannon, or 6 marine miles; but it does sweep inwardly from headlands where the general direction of the coast is changed, and follows the concave shore of those larger indents whose mouths are of greater width than the double range of cannon. Great Britain has, however, from an early day asserted municipal jurisdiction and territorial dominion over a wider extent of adjacent waters, and has demanded that her exterior sea-line shall run direct from a point 3 miles without one extreme headland to a point 3 miles without the next extreme headland, no matter how far apart these promontories may be, nor how broad and deep the included depression, nor how many the intervening and lesser projections of the land. In a word, while the general law says that territorial right is confined to those bays whose mouths are not wider than the double range of cannon, and to that part of others which lies within cannot-shot, Great Britain would extend her exclusive sway to all portions of all bays and gulfs.
> In his discussion of this subject Phillimore says:
> "Besides the rights of property and jurisdiction within the limit of cannon-shot from the shore, there are certain portions of the sea which, though they exceed this verge, may, under special circumstances, be prescribed for. Maritime territorial rights extend, as a general rule, over arms of the sea, bays, gulfs, estuaries, which are inclosed but not entirely surrounded by lands belonging to one and the same state. With respect to bays and gulfs so inclosed there seems to be no reason or authority for a limitation suggested by Martens. Thus Great Britain has immemorially claimed and exercised property and jurisdiction over the bays or portions of sea cut off by lines drawn from one promontory to another, and called the king's chambers."
> We shall see hereafter that the limitation suggested by Martens, which is thus discarded by Phillimore, is based upon principle, and is sustained by almost universal authority. Wildman simply remarks that "the sea within gunshot of the shore is occupied by the occupation of the coast." The latest English text writer upon international law is Sir Travers Twiss, and he is far from supporting the extreme British pretensions. After stating the familiar rule that hostilities can not be carried on within a certain distance of neutral coasts, he proceeds:
> "That distance is held to extend as far as the safety of a nation renders it necessary and its power is adequate to assert it; and as that distance can not, with convenience to the nations, be variable, depending on the presence or absence of an armed fleet, it is by practice identified with that distance over which a nation can command obedience to its empire by the fire of its cannon. That distance is, by consent, now taken to be a maritime league seawards along all the coasts of a nation. Beyond the distance of a sea league from its coast the territorial laws of a nation are, strictly speaking, not operative."
> He prefers to call such waters "jurisdictional," and thus describes those which he denominates "territorial:"
> "If a sea is entirely closed by the territory of a nation and has no other communication with the ocean than by a channel of which that nation may take possession, it appears that such a sea is no less capable of being occupied and becoming property than the land. In the same manner a bay of the sea, the shores of which are the territory of one and the same nation, and of which the entrance may be effectively defended against all other nations, is capable of being reduced into the possession of a nation."
> Finally, he limits jurisdiction over the "King's Chambers" to the mere right of preventing hostilities therein between other belligerents.
> Why is the range of cannon shot from the land adopted as the limit of territorial jurisdiction and property? Because the open sea is free to all, and can not be possessed or brought under the dominion of any one nation. Ortolan examines and states this principle at length with great clearness and cogency of reasoning. We can only quote his conclusion:
> "The impossibility of property in the sea results from the physical nature of this element, which can not be possessed and which serves as the essential means of communication between men. The impossibility of empire over the sea results from the equality of rights and the reciprocal independence of nations."

This fundamental principle being conceded, the converse is evident. Property in and dominion over the sea can only exist as to those portions capable of a permanent possession; that is, of a possession from the land, which possession can only be maintained by artillery. At 1 mile beyond the reach of coast-guns there is no possession any more than in mid-ocean. Hautefeuille elaborates this doctrine as follows:

"Maritime dominion stops at the place where continuous possession ends, where the people who own the shore can no longer exercise power, at the place from which they can not exclude strangers; finally, at the place where the presence of foreigners, being no longer dangerous, they have no interest to exclude them. Now the point where the causes which render the sea susceptible of private possession cease is the same for all. It is the limit of the power represented by instruments of war. All the space through which projectiles thrown from the shore pass, being protected and defended by them, is territorial and subject to the dominion of the power which controls the shore. The greatest range of a ball fired from a cannon on land is therefore the limit of the territorial sea. The seacoast does not present one straight and regular line; it is, on the contrary, almost always broken by bays, capes, etc. If the maritime dominion must be measured from every one of the points of the shore, great inconvenience would result. It has therefore been agreed in practice to draw an imaginary line from one promontory to another and to take this line as the base of departure for the reach of the cannon. This mode, adopted by almost all nations, is only applicable to small bays, and not to those of great extent, which are in reality parts of the open sea, and of which it is impossible to deny the complete assimilation with the great ocean."

Martens thus states the rule with the limitation rejected, as we have seen, by Phillimore:

"What has been said of rivers and lakes is equally applicable to bays and gulfs; above all, to those which do not exceed the ordinary width of rivers or the double range of cannon. At this day all writers agree that straits, gulfs, and the adjacent sea belong to the owner of the coast as far as the range of a cannon placed upon the shore."

In the editor's note upon this section, contained in the latest edition, the passage cited above from Hautefeuille is quoted with approval. Klüber expresses himself in a precise and practical manner:

"To the territory of a State belong those maritime districts and regions susceptible of an exclusive possession. In this number are the parts of the ocean which extend within the continental territory of a nation, if they can be commanded by cannon from the two banks, or if their entrance only can be closed or defended against vessels (gulfs, bays)."

Ortolan is even more emphatic. He says:

"We should range upon the same line as ports and roads, gulfs and bays, and all indentations known by other names, when these indentations made in the lands of the same state do not exceed in breadth the double range of cannon, or when the entrance can be governed by artillery, or when it is naturally defended by islands, banks, or rocks. In all these cases we can truly say that the gulfs or bays are in the power of the nation which is the mistress of the territory surrounding them."

Baron de Cussy examines the subject at great length. After referring to numerous treaties and laws and to many text-writers, he says:

"Sovereignty over the territorial waters of the sea reaches as far as the range of cannon fired from the shore. This sovereignty also extends to maritime districts and regions, such as roads, bays, and straits, whose entrance and exit can be defended by cannon." * * * "All bays and straits, however, can not belong through their entire surface and extent to the territorial sea of the state whose shores they wash. The sovereignty of the state over large bays and straits is limited to the distance which has been indicated in the preceding rule."

Heffter, discussing territorial dominion over the sea, states the general rule:

"Common usage has established the range of cannon as the distance within which it is not lawful to trespass, a line of limit which has not only obtained the suffrages of Grotius, of Bynkershoek, of Galiani, of Klüber, but has been adopted by the laws of many nations." * * * "If the strip of sea which washes the coast is considered as belonging to the contiguous state, if follows, for even a stronger reason, that waters connected with this portion of the sea ought to be under the dominion of the neighboring state which is able to guard them, to defend the approach to them, and to hold them under its exclusive control. Such are the ports and harbors which form a means of access to the territory. Some nations, as much by an extension of their rights as for other reasons, have arrogated to themselves a kind of dominion, or at least exclusive use, over certain portions of the high seas. Thus, in England, they include within the dominion of the state, under the name of King's Chambers, the bays situated between two promontories."

In a treaty between Great Britain and France of August 3, 1839, it is stipulated that the subjects of either state shall enjoy an exclusive right of fishing within a distance of 3 miles from low-water mark along the whole extent of its coasts. The ninth article provides that this distance shall be measured, in the case of bays of which the opening shall not exceed 10 miles, from a straight line drawn across from one cape to another.

We submit that our proposition is demonstrated, and that the correctness of the American claim is established. The position assumed by the British home and colonial governments is sustained by only one English text-writer—Phillimore. All other modern jurists of authority agree both in the general principle and in its application to the particular case. Such unanimity exists simply because the principle itself is not arbitrary, but is founded upon the essential nature and necessary elements of territorial property and dominion. It follows, therefore, that, taking the limit expressed in the treaty of 1818 as the true one, the exterior sea line along the Canadian coasts should sweep within all bays and other indents whose mouths are more than 6 miles wide, leaving portions of their waters without its boundary of exclusion, and therefore open and free for American citizens and vessels to fish therein, and to anchor, prepare to fish, and do all other acts connected with their business. Any interference with them while thus lawfully pursuing their avocation, is as much an international wrong as though they should be arrested in the very midst of the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans.

Such was the understanding of our commissioners who negotiated the treaty of 1818. Mr. Rush in a letter to Mr. Marcy in 1854, explaining the meaning of the treaty, speaking of this very question, said:

These are the decisive words in our favor. They mean no more than that our fishermen, while fishing in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, should not go nearer than 3 miles to any of those small inner bays, creeks, or harbors which are known to indent the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. To suppose they were bound to keep 3 miles off from a line drawn from headland to the headland on the extreme limits of that bay—a line which might measure 50 miles or more, according to the manner of drawing or imagining it—would be a most unnatural supposition.

Similar reasons apply to all other large bays and gulfs. In signing the treaty we believed that we retained the right of fishing in the sea, whether called a bay, gulf, or by whatever name designated. Our fishermen were waiting for the word, not of exclusion, but of admission to these large bays and gulfs.

An intelligent and able reviewer of this treaty sums up the provisions of the first ten articles as follows:

Articles I to X create an exclusive fishery for the British not consistent with the treaty of 1783 nor that of 1818. Our rights in the entire fishery in 1783 were those of a tenant in common, including the use of the shores for the purposes of drying and curing our fish, and procuring wood and water, and for repairs. The modifications in 1818 were a renunciation of our right to take fish within 3 miles of the Nova Scotia shore, and the accession of the right to dry and cure fish on certain south shores of Newfoundland.

The lines and limits in this new plan shut us out from vastly more of ocean than did the treaty of 1818. Every American statesman, Secretary of State, and President who has been brought in contact with this question between 1818 and Mr. Bayard in the autumn of 1887, including Mr. Bayard himself up to that time, has resisted and refused to consent to the British contention known as the "headland doctrine." Every umpire before whom the question was heard has decided against the British pretension. British ministers themselves have declined repeatedly to offer to enforce it, and it has rested in abeyance ever since the decisions in the Argus and the Washington cases denounced it as an untenable construction.

After such a surrender of territorial rights one would naturally expect to find some compensatory provisions in the remaining articles of the treaty, but when we examine the tenth article we find a further surrender of rights—the rights of American fishing vessels resorting to British American bays and harbors for shelter and other purposes provided for in the treaty of 1818, to exemption from unnecessary restrictions by municipal laws. These rights or liberties, as has been said, are not commercial rights, but are incidental to the greater right recognized by the treaty of fishing in certain British waters. It could not have been contemplated by the framers of the treaty of 1818 that in the exercise of these liberties American fishing vessels should be subject to commercial regulations.

By this article, if ratified, the United States will waive the right of their fishermen to the unrestricted enjoyment of these liberties except to the extent necessary to prevent the abuse of their exercise, and agree that our fishing vessels in the exercise of the rights guarantied by the treaty of 1818 shall be subject to municipal laws and shall conform to the harbor regulations provided by the municipal laws of Canada, and when resorting to such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages and remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, or communicating with the shore, or when resorting to such bays or harbors within the limits of established ports of entry for the purpose of purchasing wood or obtaining water, may be requested to report, enter, and clear. It will be observed that by this article the fishing vessels of the United States while denied commercial privileges in Canadian ports are to be subjected to commercial restrictions and regulations while in the exercise of treaty rights.

The eleventh article of the treaty provides that United States fishing vessels entering the ports of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada and of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty, may unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to the customs laws and regulations, all fish on board when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster, and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews, and that license shall be granted to United States fishing vessels to obtain by purchase (not by barter) in established ports of entry on the aforesaid coasts of Canada or Newfoundland for the homeward voyage such provisions as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, and when such license has been obtained by such vessels they shall be allowed such facilities for the purchase of casual and needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels, that is to say, such supplies as are required while fitting for the homeward voyage.

Without discussing in this connection the right or duty of the United States to demand for American vessels of every class such privileges in British American ports as are accorded to Canadian vessels in the ports of the United States, it is sufficient to say concerning this article that the privileges stipulated for the fishing vessels of the United States are such as are by the common practice of all nations accorded to vessels of other nations as acts of hospitality and humanity, and that to purchase or sell such privileges is incompatible with the honor and dignity of a great nation.

But the substantial proposition of the treaty is found in the fifteenth article. By the preceding articles the United States gains nothing of consequence and surrenders much. By the fifteenth article the commercial privileges our fishermen want, and which it is claimed on the part of the United States they are entitled to as a matter of good neighborhood and upon principles of reciprocity, are offered to us upon condition that we will give the colonial fishermen free market for their fish and fish-oil. After all that has been said by the present Secretary of State and our minister to Great Britain concerning the rights of our fishing vessels to commercial privileges in Canadian ports, the Administration has agreed with Great Britain that if we obtain such privilege hereafter we shall purchase them with the remission of duties upon Canadian fish and fish-oil. The duties on Canadian and Newfoundland fish for the year ending July 1, 1887, amount to $611,937.64.

Had fresh fish been subject to the same duty as salt fish the duties on the same for the year would have amounted to $230,126. The duties remitted on salt fish and fish-oil, with the increased importation in the future, would approximate a million of dollars a year, while the admission of Canadian and Newfoundland fish and fish-oil free of duty would, as it did under the treaty of 1871, build up the Canadian fishing interests at the expense of our own. Notwithstanding this Senators on the other side of this Chamber intimate that fish will be put upon the free-list if this treaty is rejected. I will inform them that, in my judgment, that is not the way to secure free fish for the Canadian fishermen. The ratification of this treaty, surrendering to Great Britain our claim for commercial privileges for our fishing vessels unless purchased by free fish, would lay the foundation for placing fish on the free-list. The Senator from Alabama in his recent speech declared himself in favor of the admission of Canadian fish free of duty. He need not have made the announcement. The fact that he supports this treaty was sufficient evidence as to his position upon that subject. The admission of fish free is the natural sequence of the ratification of this treaty. No doubt the only reason why a stipulation for the admission of Canadian fish into the United States duty free was not inserted in the treaty was that stated by our negotiators in their reply to the proposition of the British plenipotentiaries, who proposed—

That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States, Canada, and Newfoundland.

To which the United States commissioners replied:

While continuing their proposals, hereto submitted on the 30th ultimo, and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, the American plenipotentiaries are constrained after careful consideration to decline to ask from the President the authority requisite to consider the proposals conveyed to them on the 3d instant as means to the desired end, because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action, which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment through the medium of a treaty now existing.

Does any one believe that the British plenipotentiaries in negotiating this treaty did not confidently expect that Congress would remove the duties on fish and fish-oil, and that the fifteenth article of the treaty would become operative?

What becomes of the statement of Mr. Phelps to Lord Rosebery that the scheme of Canada to drive the United States "into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free * * * is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle?" Sir, I am much mistaken in the temper of the American people if they will submit to be driven into such a concession or yield to demands attempted to be enforced by such means. Great Britain, to make a market for the productions of British India, forced the opium traffic upon China at the point of the sword. To swell her revenues she monopolized the liquor traffic in British India and added to the wretchedness of the impoverished inhabitants by spreading intemperance among them. She assisted in the collection of the debts of her citizens in Egypt by the intervention of her ironclads. But unless the American people have hopelessly lost the spirit which animated them in 1776 and 1812 she will never succeed by harassing and annoying our fishermen in driving the United States into the admission of Canadian fish free.

The President, in his message transmitting the treaty to the Senate, says that by this treaty "the uninterrupted navigation of the Strait of Canso is expressly and for the first time affirmed." This is a mistake. As a matter of international law Great Britain never had any right to interrupt the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by the fishing or other vessels of the United States; but there is nothing in this treaty that can be construed as an abandonment on the part of Great Britain of any contention to the contrary. The language of the treaty is:

ART. IX. Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.

That is, nothing in the treaty is to be construed as a renunciation by the United States of its claim to the free navigation of the strait. This provision was evidently intended to prevent the delimitation in the treaty of Chedabucto Bay, which forms the southern entrance to the Strait of Canso, from being construed into an abandonment by the United States of its right to navigate the strait. The right of the citizens of the United States to the free navigation of the Strait of Canso does not depend upon treaty stipulation. The strait connects the Atlantic Ocean with the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the navigation of both of which are free to our fishermen and to all the world, and they have under the acknowledged principles of international law the right of free passage through it.

There are other things in this treaty and things omitted from it which should cause its rejection by the Senate; among them the extraordinary provision of Article XIII, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make regulations for the conspicuous exhibition by any United States fishing vessel upon each bow of its official number, and requiring the regulations to be communicated to Her Majesty's Government prior to their taking effect, which is justly offensive to our fishermen, and the surrender of the right of our fishermen to transship cargoes under the provisions of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871. But I will not further discuss its provisions.

It is a mistake to suppose that the pending treaty, if ratified, will remove the grounds of misunderstanding between the two countries as to our fishing rights in Canadian waters. So far from settling points of difference between the two nations so as to prevent future misunderstandings, it, in my judgment, multiplies questions for controversy. The old question of what are necessary and reasonable regulations to prevent the abuse of their privileges by our fishermen in British waters will be still a subject of controversy, and by renouncing all claim of right to fish in the great bays named in the treaty and in other bays where the width is 10 miles and under from headland to headland, the area of the waters from which our fishermen are excluded, and within which the Canadian authorities will enforce legislation to annoy and drive them out, is greatly increased, and, as we heard from the Senator from Maine, the danger of accidental invasion of British waters and of infractions of Canadian laws is greatly augmented. The unusual tides, strong currents, and prevailing fogs which for long periods will make it impossible for our fishermen to distinguish the headlands of bays at the distance from shore required by the new delimitation, all add to the risk and danger of our fishermen in prosecuting their calling in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and navigating those waters.

The fifth article of the treaty adds a new subject for evasion and misconstruction by the British authorities. It provides that nothing in the treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as can not be reached from the sea without passing within the 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818.

What does this article mean? When is the test to be made—at high or low water? What is the draught of the vessel by which the test is to be made, or is there a different rule for vessels of different draughts, so that one vessel will be excluded and another admitted; or will Great Britain claim that where the channel usually navigated by vessels entering a bay is nearer than 3 miles from either shore, all vessels are to be excluded? Not only does the treaty add to the questions for controversy with Great Britain and her dependencies, but it leaves other important and serious matters of difference between the two Governments unadjusted for future negotiation, arbitration, or settlement by other means. The question of the seal fisheries in the Behring Sea, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the Nicaragua Canal, the acquisitions and threatened acquisitions of territory by Great Britain in proximity to our shores are all left as causes for irritation, controversy, and pretext for war if either country, as some Senators suppose, desires it.

The Senator from Alabama, in his recent speech, said:

Mr. Blaine, Mr. EVARTS, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. Gresham were all members of cabinets, and two of them were Secretaries of State while discussion, which always implies negotiation, was being conducted on these same questions. The wrongs went on; the people suffered; the diplomats quarreled, as lovers do, only to prove the depths of an inner love that no surface storm can reach, but they still mildly discussed a treaty and hid away all thoughts of war from their peaceful contemplations. Their repose, which argued an indifference to the wrongs then existing, is in strange contrast with their present wild and sudden fury, excited by those wrongs.

I apprehend that the "wild and sudden fury" referred to exists only in the rhetoric of the Senator from Alabama. The position of the Republican Senators to-day is the position of the whole Senate and of both Houses of Congress and, as was claimed by the Senator, of the Administration but a little over a year ago. But what are the facts concerning the connection of Republican administrations with the fisheries question?

When Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated, the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was in force, and continued in force until 1866. During that time there was no controversy between the two Governments upon the question. The aggressions against our fishermen ceased when Canadian fish were admitted free. Before the termination of the reciprocity treaty the British Government had directed that American fishing vessels should not be interfered with unless they were found within 3 miles of the shore, or within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek less than 10 geographical miles in width. By a letter from the colonial department of the admiralty, dated April 30, 1870, and by instructions from the admiralty dated May 5, 1870, British naval officers were directed—

Not to seize any [American fishing] vessel unless it is evident it can be clearly proved that the offensive fishing has been committed and the vessel captured within 3 miles of land.

In short, the British Government, without abandoning its claim to the headland theory, directed that it should not be enforced, but the free market in the United States for Canadian fish having been lost by the termination of the reciprocity treaty, the Canadian Dominion in 1868 and in 1870, by legislation which clearly violated our treaty rights, renewed the controversy. The diplomatic controversy concerning our fisheries rights was merged in the treaty of 1871, which mainly related to Alabama claims, but by the provisions of which all grounds of controversy were once more removed by the admission of fish and the products of fish duty free into the United States for another period of twelve years. When that treaty was terminated the administration was Democratic, and is entitled to the credit, or must bear the blame, as the case may be, of subsequent negotiations.

The Senator from Alabama takes the position that the rejection of this treaty would close the door to negotiation, and adopts a line of argument calculated to alarm the country by intimating that the alternative to the ratification of the treaty is war with Great Britain. It will be interesting to contrast his recent utterances as to the necessity for a treaty with Great Britain and the danger of commercial retaliation with some remarks made by him in the Senate on the 13th of April 1886, during the discussion of a resolution which passed the Senate on that day by a vote of 35 yeas to 10 nays, and which is as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two governments, on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

The Senator said:

In listening to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, and also in what investigation I have been able to give this subject, I am unable to ascertain that there is really any unsettled question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the fisheries of the northeastern coast. I have inquired of Senators who have had long experience in the diplomatic affairs of the country, to ascertain, if I could, whether there was any open question of damages, any claim of damages arising between the Governments respectively out of any supposed breach of our fisheries treaties or our fisheries laws; and I can hear nothing of that kind. The Halifax Commission seems to have settled for good and all every controversy, sounding in damages at least, which has been promoted or urged by the citizens of the countries on either side.

Those considerations out of view, the next question would be whether there is any want of certainty in our treaty relations with Great Britain upon this subject. I conceive that there is no want of certainty in our treaty relations, and there is scarcely room for a difference in interpretation of what our treaty relations actually are. The two treaties which have settled the actual and what we might term the permanent rights of the people of the United States and of the Dominion country in regard to the fisheries are the treaties of 1783 and 1818. No other treaties we have made at all in respect to the fisheries have undertaken to define the permanent, enduring rights either of the British people or of our people in respect of the fisheries. We have had two other treaties on this subject, the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871, but they were both temporary in their character and both made liable to be suspended by the action of either government after they had run for ten years, and both have been abrogated. So that the field is entirely clear in respect of the actual state of treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain, and those treaty relations rest upon the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

We took the subject up de novo, and in that treaty of 1818 we yielded certain very important rights which I have just called to the attention of the Senate, and we had parceled out to us some other rights in perpetuity. I will call attention to Article I of that treaty to show exactly what we yielded and what we retained; we did not gain anything.

"Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland."

That appears to be a grant in perpetuity.

"From the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company."

All these rights were granted to us in perpetuity on that boundary, that definition of the limit—

"And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground."

That was what was granted to us, or rather it was what was left of our rights under the treaty of 1783. Now comes the part that we yielded:

"And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

That I consider the treaty foundation in regard to the fisheries between the United States and Great Britain. It seems to me a very clear one. I can scarcely understand how it is the subject of misconstruction or misunderstanding at all. It will be observed that in this proviso the language employed and the evident purpose of it was to extend to our fishermen a peculiar privilege in the bays, harbors, inlets, and creeks into which they might resort, in favor of our fishermen. There is nothing in that article which I have just read to indicate that the fishermen of the United States were considered in any sense a piratical people or a people who were intruding upon the rights of the people of the British-American provinces; that their traffic was in any sense an unlawful traffic or injurious to the people with whom we traded. On the contrary, this very privilege and license of entering into their bays was given to us for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the people along the coast of the British possessions.

I do not wish to volunteer any opinions about this subject before a question gets before the Senate and I am compelled to act upon it; but my convictions are very strong; they are fixed; indeed I may say that we can get along with the people of Great Britain on this subject without any further treaty at all and without any further legislation. If any one were to ask me what provision of a treaty I would frame to compose and settle any question of fundamental law between us and Great Britain in respect of the fisheries, I could not suggest it, or if I were asked to propose an amendment to the statutes of the United States, so as to put the control of this intricate subject more completely in the hands of our own Government, I could not frame the amendment to the statutes. I would not know how to do it. I believe that both the treaty stipulations and the situation under the statutes are about as complete as we are ever able to make them. There may be other interests, and there are other interests lying between the people of the British possessions and the United States that I would like very much indeed to see promoted by further negotiation, but I can not call to mind, there is no suggestion to my mind of, any improvement that we could make under existing conditions of our rights in the fisheries of that northeastern coast.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GEORGE. Would it not be well to base the right to buy ice, bait, and all that sort of thing, on the interpretation of the law?

Mr. MORGAN. Ice and bait are not mentioned in this treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. I know they are not.

Mr. MORGAN. Ice and bait are therefore to be treated as articles of commerce. If we have any right to get ice and bait there, it is under the commercial privilege extended to us by the statute of Great Britain.

Mr. GEORGE. Which Great Britain has a right to interpret for herself.

Mr. MORGAN. Interpret for herself until we come to our right to interpret, and then we say, "If you interpret it in that way we interpret our statute so and so."

Mr. GEORGE. That is retaliation.

Mr. MORGAN. And it is all you can make of it.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not come to any agreement.

Mr. MORGAN. It would hardly be expected, I think, that the diplomatic powers of two great governments should enter into a negotiation to determine the distinction between ice and bait on one side and bacon and flour on the other as articles of commerce; neither of them is mentioned in the treaty, but I should think it was unfortunate for the civilization of this age, especially I should think it unfortunate for the character of the publicists of this age, if they should find it necessary to interpret the meaning of ice and bait so as to exclude them within the commercial list, when everybody would admit that flour and bacon are included in the commercial list.

Whatever is legitimate traffic, whatever is not contraband, is lawful traffic in any port to which you have the lawful right of access; and if it is ice and bait it is just as much commerce as if it was flour and bacon. You can not claim ice and bait under the treaty, you can not claim flour and bacon under the treaty, but beyond question a merchant ship has the right to go there and buy flour and bacon and a fisherman has the right to go there and buy flour and bacon if also he is a commercial ship, for a fisherman may have two characters, and every one of them I believe has two characters. One is a business or vocation of catching fish, and the other is of dealing in freights or in merchandise, traffic, barter, or exchange just as they wish. We do not send any ships out of our ports, as I understand, exclusively for the purpose of fishing, but we arm every one of them with a sea pass and give them the protection of an enrollment or a registry, so that they are American ships in every sense of the word and commercial ships in every sense of the word.

Now, Mr. President, I beg to call attention again to the treaty of 1818 and to insist that the proviso which is found in the latter part of Article I was never intended for the purpose of discriminating against American ships and denouncing American fishermen or putting them under any bad character, casting any imputation or reproach upon them, but it was intended to provide for them privileges that at that time did not exist in the hands of ordinary commercial vessels—a favored class of ships under the treaty, a class of ships favored because of the advantages which they brought to the people living upon that northern coast.

The Senator from Alabama says:

The committee having decided without the aid of a single vote of the minority against a resolution to discuss this treaty in open session, the minority had the right to suppose that this attitude would be adhered to.

The Senator will remember that while the resolution offered by himself relating to the manner of the appointment of the American plenipotentiaries, and set forth in the minority report, was under consideration, he strongly indicated a disposition to favor the discussion of the treaty in open session. I certainly regarded what he said, and I think every other member of the committee did, as indicating that if the consideration of the treaty was not to be divested from the question of the regularity of the appointment of the so-called plenipotentiaries who assisted Secretary Bayard in its negotiations, he should vote for open sessions. The Senator was not alone in making such an intimation. He will remember also that when the vote was first taken in the committee upon the resolution for open sessions it was adopted, three members of the majority and three members of the minority, including the Senator from Alabama, voting for it; and that it was afterwards reconsidered on account of strenuous opposition of the Senator from Vermont.

Does not the Senator also know that it has been stated upon this floor by Senators on that side of the Chamber that they had caucused upon the question whether the treaty should be discussed in open session, and that they were nearly equally divided upon the question, and does he not also know that their course upon the question is in accordance with a caucus understanding, and that the same caucus considered the merits of the treaty? It comes with a poor grace under such circumstances for Senators now to talk about caucus decrees and of the change of position of Senators upon this side of the Chamber upon the subject of open sessions. If this treaty is a fair treaty which can stand upon its own merits, and will bear discussion, why is all this complaint about the discussion of this treaty in open session? Why are Senators on that side of the Chamber desirous of postponing the consideration of the treaty until December? Why so much talk about war with Great Britain if the treaty is rejected? Why is the Republican side of the Senate threatened with rash and inconsiderate action by the Executive in enforcing the retaliation act of March 3, 1887? Why the charge that the Republican side of the Senate is governed by political considerations in opposing this treaty?

Is it possible that the objection to open session is that certain Senators feel compelled to stand by the Administration and sustain the treaty, knowing that it is an abandonment by the United States of the controversy concerning the fisheries, and will not bear inspection?

Mr. President, if I were to vote against this treaty because it has been negotiated by a Democratic President, or for any other political reason; or if, believing as I do that it surrenders valuable rights secured by the treaty of 1818, that it purchases partial commercial privileges in Canadian ports for our fishing vessels and estops us from withdrawing the full commercial privileges now enjoyed in the ports of the United States by the fishing vessels of the Canadian provinces when, as I think, we should either have for our fishing vessels full commercial privileges without purchase, or give to Canadian fishing vessels in our ports only such commercial advantages as we ourselves enjoy in the Canadian provinces, I should vote for it for fear that the President will, if the treaty is rejected, use the power of reciprocity, or retaliation, if you please, which Congress has placed in his hands to be used in his discretion, in such a manner as to unnecessarily interfere with the commerce and business of the country and to produce bankruptcy and ruin to our commercial and business interests, I should be unworthy of the position I hold. And, sir, if I should vote for the surrender of American rights proposed by this treaty for another reason which has been urged upon the other side of this Chamber, namely, that the rejection of the treaty may be made a pretext for war against us by Great Britain, I should be no less recreant to the duty I owe to my constituents and the country.

Sir, our battles with Great Britain will be battles of diplomacy. She will get by diplomacy all that we are weak enough to yield, but the lessons taught her by experience have not been forgotten, and she will reserve the contest of arms for nations of less strength and fewer resources. From the close of the Revolution and the treaty of peace of 1783 until the negotiation of this treaty there has been one continual diplomatic battle between the United States and Great Britain. If she has yielded to our just claims it has been foot by foot. Treaties were no sooner made than ambiguities were claimed to exist or breaches on our part alleged to justify her refusal to execute them and to lay the foundation for a new treaty and the further exercise of her genius for diplomacy.

By the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain the independence of the United States was recognized and a partition of empire agreed upon; but in direct violation of the provisions of the treaty she held on to her fortified posts in our northwestern territory, using them as a base from which to stir up hostility among the savage tribes against us, evidently with a view of seizing a favorable opportunity to renew the struggle. She not only persisted in this wrong, but pretended to a right to retain possession of the posts, alleging that the United States had broken the treaty by permitting the States to place obstacles in the way of the collection of English debts. In short, it took another treaty—the treaty of 1794—to secure the surrender of the northwestern posts by the British Government which was stipulated for in the treaty of 1783. The settlement of our northern boundary, which by the treaty of 1783 was definite enough, required years of negotiations and treaty after treaty.

After a controversy of nearly half a century we entered into a treaty with Great Britain for the settlement of the Oregon boundary question, a settlement in which, in my judgment, we were overmatched by British diplomacy and surrendered rights which never should have been yielded and the consequence of which to us and the value of which to the British Government are just now beginning to appear. The draught of the treaty was prepared by the British ministry and the treaty was neither obscure nor ambiguous. It fixed our boundary at 40° north latitude from the Rocky Mountains to Puget Sound, and thence along "the middle channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence through the straits of Juan de Fuca to the Pacific Ocean." The Canal de Haro was the widest and deepest channel between Vancouver and the continent, the one evidently called for by the treaty, and yet Great Britain set up a claim to the San Juan Islands and other islands south and east of this channel, and declared that under any circumstances she would maintain the sovereignty of them, and sought to establish the Rosaro Straits, named and placed upon the English admiralty charts after the treaty was made, as the boundary line, and it took a quarter of a century of diplomacy and an arbitration to settle the boundary in Puget Sound in accordance with the plain stipulations of the treaty.

If it were true, which it is not, that the rejection of this treaty by the Senate would be made the pretext by Great Britain for a declaration of war against the United States, that fact should not receive a moment's consideration by the Senate.

Can it be that a people who in their infancy threw off the British yoke, and by a brave struggle and heoric sacrifices achieved their independence, who in 1812 took up the gauge of battle against Great Britain and maintained their rights against British aggression, and in other times and under other administrations never shrank from asserting and maintaining their rights upon land and sea wherever the emblem of our nationality was of right displayed, have in these later days, with their great wealth and resources and increased population, so degenerated that it is a legitimate argument addressed to United States Senators charged with the grave constitutional duty of advising and consenting to a treaty with a foreign nation that if the treaty is not ratified, and, as they believe would be the case, the rights of the United States basely yielded it would be the occasion for war?

I do not believe that the American people have so degenerated and would be willing to purchase peace upon such terms. When it comes to pass that the most important acts of this the highest legislative body in the country are controlled by fear of foreign war, or by threats of Executive proceedings which will involve the country in financial disaster and ruin, and the business interests of the country in bankruptcy, instead of by the deliberate judgment of Senators exercised under the sanction of their official oaths unbiased by fear and uninfluenced by Executive dictation, our republican institutions will indeed be in danger, but the danger will be from within and not from without.

But, sir, I do not fear a war with Great Britain. I believe the sentiment of the two countries in favor of peace and of peaceful measures for settling differences is so great as to prevent a resort to the arbitrament of war. Besides, sir, Great Britain will not resort to war with us, because it is not to her interest to do so. She has everything to lose and nothing to gain by such a war. England aspires to be the workshop of the world. Her markets are in every part of the civilized globe. Her commerce whitens every sea. Her possessions are found on every continent. Her merchants, her manufacturers, her ship-owners, her bankers and her capitalists, her artisans and laborers are all interested in preserving peace with us. We do not want war. Even if fully prepared for war, it would be a national calamity. The defenseless condition of our coasts, the exposed condition of thousands of millions of destructible property in our great seacoast cities, and the unprotected condition of our coastwise commerce would, in the event of war, at first cause us great loss. While I am free to admit that with our exposed coast and unprotected coastwise commerce we are not prepared for a war with Great Britain, I am equally certain that she can not afford a war with us, for whatever damages at the commencement she might be able to inflict upon our exposed seaports, in the end we would come out of the struggle able to make her pay the cost of the war and for the damages she had inflicted, while she would come out with the loss of her Canadian provinces and of her extended and valuable commerce.

The fortified naval stations at Halifax and Bermuda and Esquimalt are a menace to our commerce and seaport cities; but, on the other hand, her most important colonial possession is divided from our territory by an imaginary line 3,000 miles in extent. No forts can protect the Canadian frontiers, and her great ironclads can not protect her commerce in a hundred seas. At the call of even this pro-English Administration, in case of war with Great Britain, armed men from every State and Territory along the Canadian border would spring into the field to make the conquest of the provinces, and a few months of hostilities would witness on every sea where a British merchant vessel was to be found an American privateer intent on securing indemnity for the damages inflicted upon our commerce and unprotected coasts.

Again, sir, while war is undesirable and would be a national calamity, and considered in itself is a brutal, barbarous practice, there are some things more to be dreaded than war. A nation can emerge from a costly and sanguine war with its honor untarnished, with its self-respect unimpaired, its love of liberty intensified, and the foundations of its prosperity strengthened, but when to avoid the supposed necessity of maintaining its rights it basely yields to unjust demands it loses its own self-respect and the respect of other nations.

Mr. President, in 1776 thirteen feeble colonies, with three millions of people, without armies and without resources, declared their independence of Great Britain and maintained the struggle with undaunted courage and unparalleled sacrifice until the mother country was willing to treat with them for a separation. The great prize of peace and independence for the struggling colonies was within reach. The British commissioners sought to induce the American negotiators to give up their fishery rights on the British colonial coasts of North America, but great as the inducement must have been, John Adams said, "I will never put my hand to any article without satisfaction about the fisheries," and Great Britain yielded.

Contrast the reply of John Adams just quoted with the terms of this treaty. Is it possible that the American people have so degenerated during more than a century of prosperity that a nation of 65,000,000 of people, with unbounded resources, with a full Treasury, occupying a commanding position among the nations of the earth, able to command respect and to enforce its rights everywhere, the custodian of the liberties and rights won by the swords of our Revolutionary sires, is willing to purchase hospitality from Great Britain or her colonies, to buy immunity for her citizens from the aggressions of the Canadian Government in violation of treaty rights, or from fear of British ironclads is ready, without an adjudication of her rights, or rather in the face of an adjudication in our favor, tamely and voluntarily to surrender the liberties in British waters secured to us by the Revolution as we have claimed them for seventy years?

I do not believe it. The Senator from Alabama says, though his statement is contradicted by his vote:

I am not averse to open discussion of this treaty, because I know that the immense interests of the great populations contiguous to Canada and along the Great Lakes will considerately weigh every fact that bears on this controversy.

The Republican side of this Chamber have shown by their votes that they are ready to let the people of this country, not only along the Great Lakes but everywhere throughout our domain, hear the discussion as to the merits of this treaty and pass judgment upon their action in regard to it. They have too much confidence in the intelligence of the American people to think for a moment that they can by assertion or sophistry be made to believe that the alternative presented to the Senate by the Administration is the surrender proposed by this treaty or war with Great Britain, and too much confidence in their patriotism, national pride, and self-respect to think that if they could be made to so believe that even then they would be willing to make the surrender.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

During the delivery of Mr. DOLPH'S speech as given above,

Mr. PUGH said: Will the Senator give way for a minute to allow me to submit a motion?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Senator from Alabama moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that that vote will be passed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable, as the Chair understands. By unanimous consent, the Senator may proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I should be very glad to think that the motion was debatable.

Mr. FRYE. It is, by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the Chair thinks, it may be debated.

Mr. CHACE. I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that in this thin Senate that motion, as usual, will be adopted; but it seems to me that it is an error, a mistake. There are a number of questions before the Senate which it will require considerable time to debate. I do not wish to offer any factious opposition to the motion. I have no doubt if a quorum were here they would vote that way, but I simply want to put on record my protest against it. It is well on in the summer and we are wasting time.

The Senate may be well up in its business, as some Senator suggests in his seat, but there is a great deal of talking to be done, and after a time we shall have very important measures coming before us which will demand action, and then there will not be time to finish many of them. I wish to put on record my protest against adjourning the Senate in this way. I think the Senate ought to sit to-morrow and act on some of these questions. There are a number of questions which demand attention and action, and the Senate ought to stay here and attend to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. CHACE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish the Senator from Alabama would withdraw his motion and let me finish my remarks. He can then renew it.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. DOLPH resumed the floor and completed his speech as published above.

Mr. PUGH. I give notice that on Monday next at the close of the morning business I shall ask the Senate to go into open executive session for the purpose of making some remarks on the pending treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RECOVERY OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

Mr. CALL. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate such evidences as may be in the Treasury Department relating to property of the United States or to which the United States has a valid claim, which is held in adverse possession against the United States, with such recommendation as to its recovery as he may consider best for the public interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida to state the purpose of the resolution. I do not want to antagonize it.

Mr. CALL. There is some property as to which I think it is very desirable some action should be taken for its recovery.

Mr. TELLER. It refers to some particular property?

Mr. CALL. It does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on agreeing to the same.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 16, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STATISTICS OF IMPORTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 99) providing for the printing of the portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amounts of duty and rates of duty collected; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COGSWELL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of personal reasons.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1129) granting to the Newport and King's Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the Siletz Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 2536) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company the right of way through the Nez Percé Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas, and authorizing said company to build a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark.;

A bill (S. 2807) to grant to the Puyallup Valley Railway Company a right of way through the Puyallup Indian reservation, in Washington Territory, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 196) declaring the true intent and meaning of the act approved May 23, 1888.

EVENING SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, Fridays have for some time past been yielded to public business, and I understand it is the desire of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post-Roads, to have the House proceed to-day with the consideration of the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that to-morrow evening the House take a recess from 5 o'clock till 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims to which there may be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a recess be taken to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims to which there shall be no objection. Is there objection to this request? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

MINING DÉBRIS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1216) for the investigation of the mining débris question in the State of California, and that the House now proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to detail three officers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army as a commission for the purpose of making a thorough examination and investigation of the mining débris question in the State of California, and for a complete examination and survey of the injured river channel, its tributaries, and lands adjacent thereto, with a view to their improvement, and to devise some plan whereby the conflict between the mining and farming section may be adjusted. And that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, said sum to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of War; the said commission to report as early as practicable to the Secretary of War the result of their investigation.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining were read, as follows:

In line 8, after the word "injured," insert "navigable;" so as to read "injured navigable river channel."

Before the word "tributaries," in line 9, strike out "its" and insert "their."

In line 11 strike out "section" and insert "sections."

At the end of the bill add: "And the Secretary of War shall make report thereof to Congress."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to move a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "California," in line 7, strike out "and for a complete examination and survey of the injured river channel, its tributaries, and lands adjacent thereto, with a view to their improvement, and to devise some plan whereby the conflict between the mining and farming section may be adjusted," and insert "for the purpose of ascertaining whether some plan can be devised whereby the present conflict between the mining and farming sections may be adjusted and the mining industry rehabilitated, and for a complete examination of the injured navigable river channel, their tributaries and lands adjacent thereto, with a view to the immediate rectification of said rivers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

GENERAL G. CLUSERET.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of privilege. House bill No. 474, for the relief of General G. Cluseret, was returned from the Senate with a verbal amendment, and referred during my absence to the wrong committee—to the Committee on Claims instead of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I desire that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw that demand.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw it for this purpose only.

Mr. COX. This bill has been referred to the Committee on Claims. I desire that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In lines 8, 9, and 10 strike out "rendered to the Department of State in carrying out a circular instruction of that Department of May 23, 1880," and insert "and expenses in procuring information and specimens of benefit to the United States and."

There being no objection, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY, Mr. CONGER, and others addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his demand for a moment. I understood that he would allow one unanimous consent on this side as well as on the other.

Mr. BLOUNT. I agreed to withdraw in deference to the wishes of the gentleman from Maine.

ANDREW R. G. SMITH.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an office-muster to be made in the case of Andrew R. G. Smith, late hospital steward of the Second Regiment of Maine Cavalry Volunteers, so that said Andrew R. G. Smith shall thereby rank as assistant surgeon of said regiment from the 1st day of December, 1865, the date of the issuing of his commission by the governor of the State of Maine, he having performed the duties of assistant surgeon from said 1st day of December, 1865, until the 6th day of December, 1865, the date of the muster out of said regiment.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Provided, That said Smith shall receive no additional pay or allowance on account of said remuster.

Mr. DINGLEY. I only desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is unanimously reported by the committee and carries no additional compensation.

Mr. McMILLIN. What committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. The object is to give this man the rank to which he was entitled, but coupled with the proviso that it shall carry no additional compensation.

Mr. McMILLIN. And does not look to a pension?

Mr. DINGLEY. No, sir.

Mr. MAISH. Or to a bounty? I do not remember this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. No, nor to a bounty. I ask that the report be printed.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith, report:

Andrew R. G. Smith was hospital steward of the Second Maine Cavalry from the time of his enrollment, December 3, 1863, to December 1, 1865, when he was commissioned as an assistant surgeon of same regiment by the governor of Maine. But he was at the time unable to muster, and was mustered out December 6, 1865.

From June 3, 1865, he was acting assistant surgeon, and in charge of a hospital at Pensacola, Fla.

Upon his application to muster upon his commission under acts of June 3, 1884, and February 3, 1887, he was refused upon the ground of the want of a minimum number in his regiment.

1. It appears that Dr. Smith actually performed the duties of assistant surgeon from June 3, 1865.

2. That he was duly commissioned as assistant surgeon December 1, 1865.

3. That there was a vacancy in that grade, through the resignation of Asst. Surg. Louis E. Norris.

4. That he performed his duties in a capable and highly acceptable manner, as appears from the testimony of the surgeon of his regiment, Dr. George W. Martin.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment adopted, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "For compensation to clerks in post-offices for unusual business, as contemplated by Revised Statutes, section 3863, $25,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "year" in line 4 of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"The Postmaster-General may hereafter allow rent, light, and fuel at offices of the third class in the same manner as he is now authorized by law to do in the case of offices of the first and second class: Provided, That no contract for rent for a third-class post-office shall not be made for a larger period than one year, nor shall the aggregate allowance for rent made in any year exceed the amount appropriated for such purpose."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert the following: "That hereafter the postage on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, cions, and plants shall be charged at the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof, subject in all other respects to the existing laws;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 7 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

JAMES H. BLOUNT,
ALEX. M. DOCKERY,
HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. B. PLUMB,
W. B. ALLISON,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The conferees on the part of the House respectfully report that they have agreed to the accompanying conference report, and herewith submit their action to the House for its approval.

They agreed to one-half of the sum contained in the House bill as compensation to clerks in post-offices for unusual business as contemplated by Revised Statutes, section 3863, to wit, $25,000.

The effect of the report on Senate amendment numbered 2 is to fix the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel for post-offices of the third class at $450,000, instead of $650,607 as proposed in the House bill.

The action of the conferees on Senate amendment numbered 3 was to strike out the following language: "Nor shall any contract be made calling for the payment of either rent, or fuel, or lights beyond the fiscal year 1889."

The effect of the report on Senate amendment numbered 4 is to permit the Postmaster-General hereafter to allow rent, light, and fuel at offices of the third class in the same manner as he is now authorized by law to do in the case of offices of the first and second class, with a proviso restraining him from making contracts for a period longer than one year, and from exceeding the amount in the appropriation bill for allowances for rent for any given year.

The effect of the report on Senate amendment numbered 6 is to add "plants," and to fix the rate of postage on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, cions, and plants at the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces, or fractional parts thereof, subject in all other respects to the existing law.

There was no agreement on Senate amendment numbered 7.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES H. BLOUNT,
ALEX. M. DOCKERY,
HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, as already appears from the statement accompanying this report, the amount of compensation for clerks provided in post-offices for unusual business as agreed to by the conferees was $25,000, instead of $50,000 as fixed by the House. The Senate seemed to think that this was an entirely new item, and ought not to have been allowed at all. The House conferees appreciating the necessity, in view of the statements of the Postmaster-General, for this fund, insisted, as far as they could insist, but were only able to obtain an agreement on the part of the Senate to allow one-half.

Perhaps the item of most interest in relation to this appropriation bill, is for rent, light, and fuel for post-offices of the third class. The amount estimated by the Department for this service was $656,674, which the Senate cut down to $450,000, and provided that there should not be any payment for rent, light, and fuel for a greater sum than $300 per annum, and struck out all the legislation authorizing it after this year. The House conferees believed that in getting the sanction of the Senate to a recession, as to the legislation of the House allowing the rent, light, and fuel, they were amply compensated for whatever they yielded in the matter of amount for the next fiscal year only. They were further induced to this agreement by the suggestion that it would take some time to put in operation these allowances, and that whatever inconvenience might arise it was simply for a year, and that it would be well therefore to end the disagreement between the two Houses by accepting the suggestion which was embodied in the report.

In the matter of postage on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, and roots, it will be observed that the conferees agreed to the insertion of the word "plants," which had not theretofore been embodied in legislation on this subject, and fixed the rate at 8 cents a pound. I stated when the matter was up in the House before, notwithstanding the utterances with reference to a different sum to be fixed for this postage, that that was what was intended, and I am confirmed now in that conclusion by what has taken place in making the report of the conference committee to the Senate.

I ask the previous question upon the adoption of the report, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or some other gentleman, desires to be heard.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment——

Mr. BLOUNT. Let us first agree to the conference report; and when that has been done——

Mr. BINGHAM. Then amendments will be in order?

The SPEAKER. The conference report must first be disposed of, and then the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will that prevent amendment?

The SPEAKER. A report of a conference committee can not be amended.

The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that there seems to be an error in this report. The Chair is about to investigate the matter and see whether the error appears in the report as made to the Senate. The report as made to the House reads:

Provided, That no contract for rent for a third-class post-office shall not be made for a longer period than one year, etc.

The word "not" is interlined in this report and destroys the sense of the report, as the gentleman will see.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not discover the mistake until the amendment had been agreed to by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now refer to the amendment to see whether the word appears in the report made to the Senate. If it does not it will be evident that this is merely a clerical error in making the duplicate copy for the House. If it is really a part of the report it can not be amended, because a conference report can not be amended.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will certainly make no motion to amend the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that; but it is important to ascertain whether or not that is in the Senate copy.

Mr. BLOUNT. I had just discovered it as the Clerk read, and I intended to call attention to it myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the word "not" does not appear in the Senate report, and is therefore evidently a clerical error in making the duplicate. The Clerk will read that part of the report made to the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no contract for rent for a third-class post-office shall be made for a longer period than one year.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests, therefore, that the gentleman erase the word "not" from that report, as it is evidently a clerical error in the copying.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the conference report is accepted, it being an agreement upon six items and a disagreement upon the seventh, can the seventh item be amended?

The SPEAKER. The question will still be left open. The House may recede from its disagreement entirely, it may recede and agree to the amendment with an amendment, or it may recede and agree to it without an amendment. The question is upon agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The remaining amendment is now before the House for such action as the House sees proper to take.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is only one amendment disagreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only one; the seventh.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the amendment disagreed to.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

To provide more efficient service between the United States and Central and South America and the West Indies, $800,000. To promote the purposes of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to contract with American built and registered steam-ships for the transportation of the United States mails to such ports in said countries as in his judgment will best subserve said postal service. Said contracts shall be for a period of not less than five nor more than ten years, at a compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BINGHAM, as follows:

Amend, in line 111, by inserting, after the words "West Indies," the words "Australasia, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands."

Amend, in line 112, by striking out "eight hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "four hundred and fifty."

Amend by striking out all after the word "service," in line 117, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And in cases where a contract shall be made in addition to the sea and United States inland postage allowed under section 4009 of the Revised Statutes to registered United States steam-ships plying between ports of the United States and Central and South America, the West Indies, Australasia, China and Japan, and the Sandwich Islands, the Postmaster-General may, by agreement with the owners of said steam-ships, at an equivalent consideration therefor, allow any sum not exceeding three times the sum of the said sea and inland postage to steam-ships running to such of the said countries as are in the Postal Union, and an equivalent sum to steam-ships to such of said countries as are not in the Postal Union, for dispatching their vessels without failure upon certain days to be specified in schedules covering periods of not less than six months, to be agreed upon in advance by the Postmaster-General and said owners or agents: Provided, That any failure to dispatch a vessel upon a schedule date may subject the owners or the agents to a penalty not less than the sum to which the vessel would be entitled for the conveyance of mails if she had sailed in accordance with the schedule; said penalty to be deducted by order of the Postmaster-General from any sums found to be due said owners or agents."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] moves that the House recede from its disagreement and agree to the amendment of the Senate with the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] whether his only motion is to recede and agree to the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. This is the only point of disagreement in conference.

Mr. ADAMS. I am aware that the only point of disagreement is this amendment. I understood the other day, however, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was intending to move to recede from the disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, but now I appear to be corrected, because his motion is not to recede and concur in the amendment of the Senate, but to agree to the amendment with an amendment which has been read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BINGHAM. For the reason that we take the body of the Senate amendment, enlarge it in many particulars, and cut down the appropriation. The principle is maintained.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether we can not reach an agreement as to the length of debate upon this bill to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. BINGHAM. This side will want three hours.

Mr. SPINOLA. And this side will want six. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. There are several gentlemen who desire to discuss this proposition, and while I am entitled to the floor I am of course desirous of knowing to what extent this debate will run, in order that the time may be properly divided.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course I want to come to an agreement with the gentleman in reference to the time. He has submitted a proposition, and responses to it are being made on my side, and I have been taking them in. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS. At this stage of the proceeding, or at any future stage, is it or will it be proper to move to recede with an amendment different from the amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has just had read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may move to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, either by an amendment in the form of a substitute, or by adding to it, or striking out a part of it. The Chair thinks, moreover, that if the proposition to recede from the disagreement of the House and agree to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment should be rejected, it would still be in order to move to recede from the disagreement, and agree without an amendment; in other words, to concur, the idea being always to reach an agreement between the two Houses, if possible.

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accede to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], which is substantially a proposition for three hours of debate on each side, and I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent that debate be closed at the end of six hours, the time being equally divided between the two sides of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I hope it will be understood, however, in that connection, that the session to-day will be extended so that we may take a vote upon the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that. I think the suggestion a very proper one.

Mr. WILKINS. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. WILKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the proposition for six hours' debate, or only to the modification suggested?

Mr. WILKINS. Yes, I object to the six hours' debate.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is under the control of the gentleman who has the matter in charge.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WILKINS. I will not. I insist that this debate ought to close in time to enable us to take a vote by 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am sure it will not.

Mr. WILKINS. That will allow five hours.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman may object, but he can not control this bill. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that so far as it may be in my power I will endeavor to accord the time which he indicates his side desires.

Mr. SPINOLA. Let each side take all the time they want on this important question.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

[Mr. BINGHAM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, prior to the year 1845 the amount paid for the transportation of ocean mail postal matter was exceedingly small. No contracts were made. The Government itself did not pay for the postage except to American vessels; and under the act of 1825 up to 1845 only 2 cents per letter was allowed. The foreign vessels were not allowed anything. In 1845 Congress passed a law authorizing the Postmaster-General to make contracts with American steam-ships for the transportation of the mails. That act contained no limitation as to the amount to be paid.

It was claimed then as now, that something must be done for American commerce. In that act authorizing contracts we made one with the Ocean Steam Navigation Company covering a period of ten years, at an annual compensation, in 1848, $100,000; 1849, $200,000. But I will not take up the time of the House by reading, but will insert the table in my remarks of the payments which were made.

Then a contract was made with E. K. Collins & Co. in 1858, under which large amounts of money were paid out by the Government. After this there was a contract made with Arnold Harris, under which many millions were paid. I should dislike to take the time of the House by running over these three contracts, one covering $3,000,000, another $5,000,000, and the other $3,000,000. There was a contract made by the Secretary of the Navy with a man by the name of Sloo, under which a large sum of money was paid, running through a period of years.

Now, the contract with the Collins Line provided for the construction of five vessels to be suitable for naval purposes and within the control of the Government in case of war, which were to run, I think, once a month, but I am not sure of that, between this country and Liverpool, making the round trip once a month. As I have said, these vessels were to be subject to the control of the Government and suitable for naval purposes. The result was that only four of the vessels were constructed. The Attorney-General held, notwithstanding the vessels were not constructed under the terms of the contract, notwithstanding but four vessels were constructed and run instead of five under the contract, that notwithstanding these failures to comply with the contract, nevertheless the Collins company were entitled to the compensation fixed in the law without reference to the contract. Investigation after investigation was had developing these facts, and general discontent was all over the country.

So it was in reference to these other contracts with Sloo and Arnold Harris, running from New York to Aspinwall, and from Panama to Astoria. Contracts were made in terms to protect the Government, but the fact turned out to be that the number of vessels required were never put on, but there was influence enough in the Department, and in Congress, notwithstanding investigations were had, for the purpose of preserving this condition of things to the advantage of the ship-owners, and to the detriment of the Government of the United States.

I will read from the debate in the Senate at that time as it is found in the Congressional Globe of June 10, 1858.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, by special contract with him; and that was the way with the Sloo contract and the Harris contract. They were to build ships fit for war purposes. I know when the Collins vessels were built. I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, and I remember that the men at the head of our Bureau of Yards and Docks said they were not worth a sixpence for war purposes; that a single broadside would blow them to pieces; that they could not stand the fire of their own guns. But newspapers in the cities that were subsidized commenced firing on the Secretary of the Navy, and he succumbed and took the ships. That was the way they were got here. Then they were to be commanded by lieutenants in the United States Navy. That was another part of the contract. Mr. Collins came here and said: "I do not want these people on my ships; they are not good for much."

I rather yielded that point, because there was much in what he said; and we agreed to let him have his own commanders. All this was done under the naval power. It was said we wanted these ships for naval purposes and that they would be very valuable in case of war. Nobody maintains that idea now; it is given up; but it was used to get Congressional contracts with particular individuals for their benefit, and not, as my honorable friend from Mississippi says, for the benefit of the Government. That has been the trouble of the whole system. It has been for the benefit of contractors, not of the Government. That has always ruled in making the contracts and always will when Congress makes contracts. How can Congress make a contract? Here are sixty-four of us in this body; there are two hundred and thirty-six in the other House—gentlemen of different pursuits. True there may be one or two ship-carpenters among the whole number, but the great bulk of them are fit for nothing on earth but politics—fit for no business. We have some who are very well qualified for many things, but not for other things. As for the idea that such a body can make a contract, I presume there is no human being in America, white or black, who can doubt that it is the most unfit body for such a purpose that could be collected. There is no responsibility. One-half of them do not know who did it and if they did they would not care. Nine-tenths of them act from ignorance on such a matter, because they know nothing about it, and we generally have only ex parte statements from those interested. We have not time to examine the public questions connected with the various Departments of the Government and all the little contracts besides. It is impossible to do that and attend to our legislative duties. I would go back to the earlier policy of the Government, the persistent policy of the Government against the idea of my friends from Louisiana and Mississippi. We never had a steam-ship afloat on the ocean to carry the mails abroad until 1850.

Now, sir, in the Thirty-second Congress the Secretary of the Navy made a report upon these several lines, declaring the contracts as I have stated them, and also the failure of the contractors to comply with their contracts, and fully supporting what was said by Mr. Toombs, the Senator from Georgia, in the debate from which I have read. So outrageous were these failures to comply with these contracts, as shown by the investigations, that in 1858 the Senate of the United States, without a yea-and-nay vote—nay, without a division—pronounced against all of these contract steamers as fraudulent, and, so far as the vessels were concerned for naval purposes, as an utter fraud and imposition on the Government, and placed on the Post-Office appropriation bill the law providing for payment of sea postage to foreigners and sea and inland to American steamers; and that is the way we came to get the act of 1858, and whenever we start out on this line of making contracts for the mails, as proposed in this amendment, of which we have experience, we shall always come to scandal and frauds.

Now, sir, there were then the contracts made with these three lines to which I have referred, and they were necessarily continued; they were in force for ten years, and all the operations of the Government were just as these gentlemen wanted them, until the terms expired; so for several years we had had these large payments to make after the aforesaid legislation.

In 1866 we subsidized the Brazilian line, and a little later on we subsidized what is known as the Pacific Mail line. I maintain, sir, that we never got any additional mail by reason of the aid given by the Government to either of these lines. The Brazilian mail line contract expired, and we continued to get the same service that we did before under the contract. The Pacific Mail line contract, of all the lines with which Congress has authorized special contracts to be made—and while I say special, the terms were general, but the contract, everybody knew, pointed to the Pacific Mail line—has proved most notorious.

Perhaps a greater scandal came to the House of Representatives growing out of that contract than out of anything which has occurred in our history. They desired to increase the amount of the service. Of course it was designed for the "benefit of commerce," for the "improvement of the mail system," and was prompted entirely by "motives of patriotism;" but just along there an investigation comes in as to where this movement commenced, and from that investigation gentlemen who will take the trouble to examine it will ascertain perhaps whether it was for the benefit of commerce or whether it was for the benefit of the mail system of the country. A committee was charged with the investigation of the matter, and their report will be found in Report No. 268, Forty-third Congress, second session, on China mail service, 1874-'75, wherein the committee reported in reference to the expenditure, which turned out to be about $1,000,000, as was supposed about this Capitol, for the purpose of getting an additional sum for this company; and while I have not time to read this investigation, I will state as briefly as I can the substance of it, which was to the effect that Allen B. Stockwell, the president of the Pacific Mail Company, made contracts amounting to over $900,000 for the purpose of getting "patriotic legislation" in the interest of American commerce and the American mail service through this House and the other.

What was the result of that investigation? Ah! gentlemen, it was shrewdly planned. The money had been spent. Some gentlemen in the House of Representatives were ascertained to be connected with it; and their names have been blackened from that hour to the present time. Called on to testify, some hid themselves behind the relations of attorney and client, and others fled the country, and the truth was never ascertained. I say, therefore, the history of this country in its past legislation warns this House against a repetition of the evils of that proceeding.

But, sir, I wish to call your attention to the question of whether or not the American vessels are receiving adequate mail compensation. I wish to ask whether, if that be true, if they do receive adequate mail compensation, it does not include the entire question in relation to the matter at issue before the House at this time? What I wish to say in reference to that subject will be said plainly, and I know the parties who may be seeking subsidies and may be persuaded that the money should be used in this way, and for no other purpose, will assert my reasoning a most contemptible way of combatting what they call a great question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who has just taken his seat, stated to the House that prior to 1885 the administration of the Post-Office Department had never given more than the sea postage to American vessels carrying the mails, but since that time the present administration had been paying both sea and inland postage, which was four times the amount paid prior to that time; and, so far as I know, the history shows that there were no complaints about that matter.

I ask your attention now to the Pacific mail line from San Francisco to Panama for 1885. The amount paid on the mail matter, if paid at freight rates, would have been $2.86 a trip. This is an exceedingly small mail. If paid at parcel dispatch rates it would have been $40.12, and if paid at sea and inland postage rates would be $140.20. That line is getting for the carrying of the mails just seventy times what it gets for carrying freight. It is getting nearly four times what it would get for express packages, and they are under no liability to the Government for loss of the mails. They are under liability for the loss of express matter.

In the carrying of the mails—the Brazilian mail, for instance, and many others—by reason of the fact of carrying the mails they have certain port privileges; they can break bulk at once without delay, while other vessels are kept waiting; they may arrive and depart at any time without interference by reason of the fact that they are carrying the mails, and this is to them quite an advantage.

Let us turn to the Pacific mail line from New York to Colon. The amount paid at freight rates would be $1.11 per trip. The amount, if paid at parcel dispatch rates is $202, and at sea and inland postage is $517.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. For what amount and how computed on weight?

Mr. BLOUNT. They are paid $1.60 a pound on letters and 8 cents on newspapers.

They are paid by weight. If my friend will allow me, I wish to say that this is just four times what we give foreign ships. The foreign ships are carrying many of these mails because we have to take the first vessel, with a view of expedition, that we can get the mail on. On the line from New York to Venezuela per trip the freight rates for the mail would be $1.74. If paid at parcel-dispatch rates the rate would be $33. If paid at sea and inland postage rates the rate would be $115, nearly one hundred times what the freight rate would be.

Now, what is the inconvenience? There is a little room set apart for that purpose on all vessels. They put express packages in there, and the packages go across the water without any responsibility at all.

The amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] introduces what I supposed had disappeared—the Chinese mail. Many have thought that the scandal of the Pacific mail to China was a thing of the past, but here it comes back again in my friend's amendment to be taken care of. The Australian mail is also in there to be taken care of.

I think I have made it appear plainly if we are seeking to get at meritorious rates for carrying mail matter that four times the sea and inland postage commends itself to the approval of every man who will treat the matter in a business way.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that the great bulk of this mail under the Senate amendment, the mail from San Francisco to Panama and from New York to Colon, goes on the Pacific Mail line, with George Gould as the president and Jay Gould and numbers of others as directors, whose names will appear in an attached table. Huntington is interested, too. The Brazil line, presided over by Mr. Thurber, has for one of the chief owners Mr. Huntington, who has had some legislative experience. Doubtless he has a great deal of patriotism and a great desire to promote American commerce and improve the mail service of this country. I am sure the American people will respond in all places and at all times with admiration for his efforts.

Mr. Speaker, it is the practice constantly to say in response to what I have stated as to mail pay, "See what England pays, what France pays, what Germany pays." So far as England is concerned, the Postmaster-General has rightly stated that her action is political. The subsidies she has given have as a general rule gone to her colonies, with which she must keep up her political relations and her political obligations, just as the Eastern section of this country does with the Western and the Northern with the Southern. It is their own country, notwithstanding the ocean intervenes. It is likewise of advantage to her because of her economic laws, which look to the promotion of trade with the foreign countries of the world. How about France? Mr. Speaker, when we come to look at the action of these countries, and compare their action with the proposition contained in this bill, the intelligence in the first and the carelessness in the last policy can but suggest that that carelessness comes because the real object is not to be perceived from the language of the law, to wit, to give a bonus to existing American lines.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will it disturb you to indicate the difference between the cost in those countries and in ours as proposed in this amendment? You have spoken of England, France, and Germany.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will come to that. In France, Mr. Speaker, they have adopted what they believe to be a system of increasing their commerce, increasing their shipping, increasing its profits. They provide bounties for iron or steel vessels of 50 francs per ton, gross measurement, and for wooden vessels of 200 tons or more 20 francs per ton. I have not time to give all the figures, but will print them.

THE FRENCH BOUNTY LAW.

The bounty proposition in France assumed a definite form by the promulgation of a law in January, 1881, by which the privileges enjoyed by ship-builders since 1866 of importing free of duty all materials used in the construction and equipment of vessels were abolished, and a system of bounties paid directly from the state treasury was substituted. These bounties were fixed at the following rates: For iron or steel vessels, 60 francs per ton, gross measurement; for wooden vessels of 200 tons or more, 20 francs per ton; for wooden vessels of less than 200 tons, 10 francs per ton; for composite vessels, 40 francs per ton; for engines placed on board steamers, and for auxiliary apparatus, such as steam-pumps, donkey-engines, winches, ventilators worked by machinery, also their boilers and pipes, 12 francs per kilogram. These various allowances were payable on the delivery of the French register by the receiver of customs at the nearest place of construction.

Nor was the state aid confined to the construction of ships only; it was extended to the navigation of them.

"ART. 9. As compensation for charges imposed on the mercantile navy for the recruitment and service of the military navy, a navigation bounty shall be granted, during ten years from the date of publication of this law, to all French vessels, sailing or steam."

This bounty is applicable only to foreign-going vessels.

It is fixed at 1.50 francs per register ton and per 1,000 miles' run for vessels of French construction fresh off the stocks, and decreases annually by—

	Francs.
For wooden vessels	0.075
For composite vessels	0.075
For iron vessels	0.05

For foreign-built vessels the bounty is reduced to one-half of the above-assigned amount.

Now, sir, the result of all this legislation so far as France is concerned as compared with Germany, who gave no bounties, who gave no subsidies, who only paid 370,000 marks per annum for her mail up to about 1885 (a mark being a little over 20 cents), the French bounties being for ship-building, for navigation, and for subsidies for carrying the mail, Germany increased in shipping at a greater rate, she built larger ships, her trade increased more rapidly; and while her ship-owners were in a comparatively good condition, nearly all the subsidized lines of France were in bankruptcy.

We are told we ought to go down into South America with subsidized lines, as England, France, and Germany do. Germany has gone on, side by side, with the subsidized lines, built up her trade pari passu with other nations except England, without subsidies, depending for her mail communications and largely for the transportation of her commerce, both with Australia, with China and South America, upon English ships.

Therefore it is quite evident that these subsidies did not bring about this result. In 1881 France adopted this policy. Prior to 1881 she was increasing in ship-building and the extension of her trade faster than Germany, but immediately afterward Germany ran past her. France had in mind, among other things, the idea of extending her trade with America by subsidizing a steam-ship line here, but in one or two years after she had put on that line her trade with America began to decrease, and it decreased year by year. So that the experience of France does not at all help the argument of gentlemen on the other side. Germany—in 1886, I think—did put on one line to East Asia and Australia, and information which is believed to be authentic discloses the fact that in 1887 that line lost £280,000. Imitating France in the matter of subsidies, she has run her lines where France has run hers, into bankruptcy.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the bounty system to steam-ship lines has resulted in an overproduction of vessels, until they can be bought for half their cost. They are lying-up in the various harbors of the world, and of those that are running some are not paying running expenses. And yet, in such a situation, with the freights of the world carried at these meager rates, gentlemen urge us to launch our people out into that same great sea of bankruptcy and ruin.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has undertaken to compare what we pay ocean steamers for the carriage of the mails with the amount we pay the railroads, the steam-boats, and the star service. In relation to that I wish to say that the two kinds of service are entirely different, and are performed under entirely different conditions, so that necessarily a different rule must be adopted.

In 1873 we did pass a bill providing for paying so much per pound, per ton, per mile per annum to the railroads. We contracted with steamers by letting contracts to the lowest bidders, and so we did with reference to what is known as the star-route service. So far as what we pay the railroads is concerned, it has been reduced since then, at one time 10 per cent., and at another time 5 per cent., and I believe it is generally conceded that the railroads are getting entirely too much to-day. So far as the steam-boats are concerned, they are inland; they are protected by our navigation laws, and I am not here at this time to take issue with any one upon that point; but I remind gentlemen that that service also is let to the lowest bidder. The rates are not fixed by reason of any design to help the railrords or steam-boats. The contracts are let to the lowest bidders in the steam-boat star service.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; the Postmaster-General has discretion.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman must allow me to state it as I understand it. The Postmaster-General undertakes to get that service as low as he can, and even as to the Cuban service, to which my friend has referred, the Postmaster-General advertised for bids. But how is it with reference to the ocean mail? Will you advertise for the lowest bidder for that service? Will you undertake to get it as you do your inland service, as cheaply as you can?

Mr. BINGHAM. The law says that preference shall be given to American vessels.

Mr. BLOUNT. Please do not interrupt me. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a line of American ships running from this country to Europe. In the Central and South American service the lines are well known, and they are few. If you undertake to have your mails carried from this country to Brazil by letting the service to the lowest bidder, unless you do as Great Britian does, submit it to the lowest bidder and let any person in the world take the contract, you will have no competitive bidding practically. This would be the case on the Brazil line. So it is with reference to the China mail and with reference to the mail from San Francisco to Panama, and from Colon to New York. So it is with reference to all of these lines, and when gentlemen talk about paying $1 a mile and letting the service to the lowest bidder, although there is nothing in the gentleman's amendment providing for that——

Mr. BINGHAM. The general law authorizes that.

Mr. BLOUNT. But my friend is making a law for this case, and his amendment directs the Postmaster-General to make the contract; it does not authorize him, it requires him to do it. In all previous attempts to pass subsidies there has been an effort to seem to be reasonable by giving the Postmaster-General authority to do what was desired, but the action of Mr. Vilas heretofore upon these questions has put these gentlemen on notice, and so they bring in a provision here directing him to make contracts. As every one knows, that means that he must go to the Pacific Mail line running from San Francisco to China, running from New York to South America, running from New York to Central America, running from New York to Brazil. It seems that he must go to these lines and pay them $1 per mile for the carrying of the mails. Now, sir, I have shown that there is no analogy between this ocean service and the railroad service, the steam-boat service, or the star-route service.

And yet, sir, it is shown by a table which I will publish (for I have not time to read it) that the American steam-ship lines are getting to-day just as much per mile as the railroad, steam-boat, and star-route lines are getting. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, this poor, impecunious, begging corporation, the Pacific Mail line, with the humble men who are at the head of it, who are asking this additional subsidy, have already obtained a subsidy all along the western coast in connection with the service to Mexico and Central and South America. They are getting now from the Mexican Government and some of the Central American states subsidies of which no account is made here, and which the inland service has no opportunity to enjoy.

My friend from Pennsylvania has read to you some tables in relation to the cost of the service to Central and South America in 1858, and at subsequent periods.

I desire to call attention to a table of mail pay for Central and South America for 1858–'59, 1874–'75, and 1886–'87 which I will print.

I wish now to call attention to a circumstance which occurred in the debate during the last Congress in reference to increasing the service of these lines. One of the main arguments made with reference to increase of service pointed to the Argentine Republic. It was especially urged by the president of the Brazil Mail Line and by gentlemen in debate here that the Argentine Republic was developing into one of the greatest South American states, that we had no mail service with that country, and there ought to be some discretion allowed with the view of our getting farther down that coast into the Argentine Republic. I read at that time a communication from Mr. Hanna, the American minister down there, stating that negotiations were going on between a gentleman in New York and the Argentine Republic to put on a line between Buenos Ayres and New York; that the President and his Cabinet had agreed to submit the matter to Congress; that it was expected a contract would be made and that the line would be put on without any subsidy from the American Government. The offer was $100,000. The Brazilian Government, I am informed, declined to allow the Brazilian line to enter into a contract for the extension of that service down the coast. There is some rivalry between the Venezuelan people and those of Brazil, and therefore objection was made. It was urged here that as the Argentine Republic was proposing a contribution we ought also to give about $100,000. But Congress saw fit not to do so; and the Argentine Republic has actually made a contract for a line between New York and Buenos Ayres, which will go into operation in a very short time for the sum of $87,000.

Such were the inducements held out to us during the last Congress, more by reason of the inviting trade with the Argentine Republic than for any other, for subsidizing a line with the view of getting commerce; yet, to-day, without a dollar from the public Treasury, the line is to go on for a period of ten years. So, sir, wherever the condition of trade requires means of transportation, especially trade with foreign countries, you but have to stand still and the eager bankrupt owners of vessels are on hand ready to transport your commerce.

This is the situation on the ocean to-day. There is and will be no trouble about ships whenever there is trade. The Postmaster-General has wisely stated that in reference to South America the restraints on trade by reason of our own legislation prevent the extension of commerce in those countries. I have not time to refer in detail to the figures on this subject, but they are exceedingly instructive. They show in the first place that the great bulk of our trade with those countries is where there is no duty, and that where there is a duty the trade to and from those countries is about equal, supporting the rule that you must have exchange in order to have trade.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have satisfactorily stated to the House the rates of postage as compared with freight rates and express rates, and shown that they ought to be entirely satisfactory. They are satisfactory to the commerce of the world. They are satisfactory to the carriers in dealings between man and man. They are satisfactory everywhere, except to the ship-owners engaged in carrying our mails. I have shown how the bounty systems of Europe have brought bankruptcy to the ship manufacturers and ship owners, and how they have utterly failed in the matter of extending commerce. I have shown that trade can not be promoted in this method. I have shown that there is no analogy between the internal and the external carriage of commerce; that they are on different principles, if properly executed, entirely in the interest of the people instead of the carriers, as the argument of the gentleman on the other side [Mr. BINGHAM] would indicate.

Now, let us come to this particular amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] state the amount paid for the transportation of foreign mails, as compared with that paid for the inland railway and steam-boat mail service?

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman mean to inquire in regard to our ocean mail service generally, or simply the mail service with South America?

Mr. HOOKER. The ocean mail service.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will print a statement. Now, sir, before discussing this amendment in particular I desire to read it.

To provide more efficient mail service between the United States and Central and South America and the West Indies, $800,000. To promote the purposes of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to contract with American built and registered steam-ships for the transportation of the United States mails to such ports in said countries as in his judgment will best subserve said postal service. Said contracts shall be for a period of not less than five nor more than ten years, at a compensation not exceeding for each outward trip $1 per nautical mile of the distance in the most direct and feasible sailing course between the terminal points as shall be found expedient and desirable to secure the ends above set forth.

It is to be observed, sir, in the first place that contracts would be entered into for five or ten years. Take the case of the Argentine Republic.

Mr. BINGHAM rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. Excuse me, I have not time to finish what I have to say.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have agreed to disagree to that proposition, and I have submitted an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not interrupt me. He says we have agreed to disagree, and yet here is the Senate with an amendment on our bill. And does not the gentleman know it is not disposed of, and that because he has seen fit to offer another amendment it does not take it out of the way?

You have to enter into a contract for five or ten years. Suppose you have made a contract with the Brazilian line connecting down the coast with Buenos Ayres by carrying the mails to that country. Suppose you had it for five or ten years and up springs the mail from New York to Buenos Ayres. How are you to use it? You tie the hands of the Government so that it can not take advantage of the changed conditions of commerce. There you are tied hand and foot for a period of years under this contract.

Now the Postmaster-General is unfettered, and he puts the mail to Central and South America on every vessel, American or foreign, which happens to be leaving the port at the time. For one-half he pays four times as much as the other. For the whole he pays about $45,000, and he tells you that under this amendment it will cost about $1,200,000. One million two hundred thousand, sir, to carry the mails, one-half of which are now carried by foreign steamers and one-half by our own at the rates named. This amendment cuts off the service one-half, and makes the cost $1,200,000. I ask the House whether the Postmaster-General is not correct when he states that it is an absolute embarrassment to the Post-Office Department in the matter of handling the mails?

Why, sir, the proposition would seem to be monstrous that the Postmaster-General shall stop the mails when the time comes to send them abroad, and when there is a fine ship to take them, and require that they shall wait until an American steamer is ready to make the trip, an American steamer, one of George Gould's establishments going from San Francisco to Panama or Colon to New York—to wait until Gould and Huntington come along with their ships. Then you contract with these men to carry your mail, and the service instead of costing $40,000 will cost $1,200,000. Do it if you will. In the Forty-fourth Congress the gentleman from Indiana, by a resolution in this House, declared against subsidies to all sorts of corporations, and it was agreed to by an overwhelming vote. In the Forty-fifth Congress the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. John H. Baker, a gentleman on the other side of the House, able and true, whose name I shall ever preserve in my memory with great respect for his intelligence and capacity, offered a resolution providing as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the House no subsidies in money, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit, should be granted or renewed by Congress to associations or corporations engaged in or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises; but that all appropriations ought to be limited to such amounts and purposes only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service of the Government.

Who voted for this? My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], and he has stood true to it from then until now; my friend, Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana; also that illustrious personage who once figured as the highest man in this House, and who was afterwards President of these United States, Mr. Garfield; Mr. Haskell, and our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], as well as our distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED]. It was agreed to in this House by a vote of 126 yeas to 85 nays.

From that time, in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses, these same impecunious patriots have been here attempting to force on the House of Representatives, by amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bills, these very subsidies which that resolution declared that the House would not tolerate.

And if gentlemen want to go before the country on the record of this amendment, mar the mail service, cut it off, increase the compensation enormously, to the great advantage of the Pacific Mail line and to the great advantage of the Brazilian line—these are the chief beneficiaries—I say if they want to do it I have no question to make with them. They must bear the responsibility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask my friend from Illinois to yield to me a portion of his time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia such time as he may desire.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, who has offered the amendment to the Senate amendment, feels, I suppose, the destructive force of the criticism of the Postmaster-General upon the Senate amendment. He proposes to take in the Australian line and the line to China, and to pay them four times the sea and inland postage. They are getting fifty to one hundred times the freight rates, or more than that—I have given the exact figures, and therefore any effort to repeat them here might result in inaccuracy—and yet, without any suggestion, so far as I know, from any quarter, my friend offers to take in these lines to China and Australia and pay them, I repeat, four times the sea and inland postage, which is sixteen times what any foreign vessel is willing to take now. We have, sir——

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is quoting my statement——

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think I am. I was attempting to quote the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is it; but the whole thing subject to the discretion of the Postmaster-General under existing law. Now, since the gentleman is quoting the amendment, I hope he will not leave out an essential qualification.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, the gentleman says "subject to the discretion of the Postmaster-General." If my friend wants the discretion of the Postmaster-General, then I say by authority that the sea and inland postage is all the discretion he wants.

Mr. BINGHAM. He does not say so in his report.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not care what he says in his report. I say it by authority of the head of that Department in my place on this floor; and would not do it, sir, but for the fact that in another place a distinguished gentleman has seen fit to announce, and by authority, that the Postmaster-General favored this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. That he favored the "Blount bill" was the statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, the gentleman says the "Blount bill." That is about in keeping with the other methods connected with this subject. When I came on to Washington there was a suggestion pending and being discussed in reference to the increase of the sea and inland postage, having the Argentine Republic in mind in this special provision—and their mail is already provided for—and as I had in many other cases introduced bills and had them referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, because I wanted all phases of this question to be presented, and in order that every possible condition of the subject might be before the committee, that bill was presented. But in reference to that bill I deny that the Postmaster-General has ever given one line or syllable of it his indorsement. That is the whole of it. And when that bill was published many gentlemen came to me, because it was known about the Capitol as the Blount bill, to whom I declared my opposition to it, and with the subsidized crowd I seemed to have grown very popular for a time on account of it. I am quite youthful, as my friend from Pennsylvania knows, but not quite that young. [Laughter.] It is not my bill; never was.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the gentleman failed to put "by request" upon it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, well, will my friend not take my statement because I did not put "by request" on the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly I will take the statement; but I say it does not appear on the record that it was "by request," and I have only been quoting the record.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, if my friend was discussing a great question with earnestness, I do not believe, whether in seriousness or jest, he would take the chance of misleading a single member of this House as to what sanction I have given to that bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman must not state that I endeavored to mislead the House. I answered the direct inquiry, that I did not say it was his bill, nor do I say so now.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the gentleman has alluded to it so often and in a smiling way, I supposed of course that he intended to create that impression.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, I only alluded to it in good humor.

Mr. BLOUNT. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of any consequence, because I wish it to be understood that I introduced the bill, as I have introduced many other bills which I did not favor, because it was a subject proper to be considered in the committee, and I was anxious to take it up and investigate it in every light. I introduced it; but I did not undertake to father it, and I deny that the Postmaster-General fathers it, or goes a single step farther than he has gone in his letter, and that letter I am glad to say, sir, if attentively read, will satisfy any fair-minded person that he favors neither the amendment of the Senate nor that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. On the contrary, he believes that the provisions for the service to-day are ample, and believes to-day that we have the very best mail system on earth. He has stated that so far as the European mails are concerned, our own system gives us a better service by sending the mail nearly every day in the year, while the British mails coming to this country, taking the subsidized lines, are not near so good, and that there is complaint in England as well as this country by reason of the service, and it is not unusual to find our European mails, coming on subsidized lines, following after the goods to which the mails relate, which come here two and three days, sometimes, before the mails. So far as the South American mail is concerned, we are paying our own ships four times the service we are paying to the foreign ships and for the same service. There is no desire for more money.

I trust that with this statement, with this relation of the Department to this bill and both of these amendments, this House will not, by any delusion that American commerce is to be promoted and American mails facilitated, cripple that very mail system and cripple that commerce. No gentleman will undertake to say, so far as the commerce is concerned, that this subsidy amounts to anything compared to the subsidies of foreign governments. Will you then undertake with a small bonus to compete with those large subsidies? Is it not a failure? Does it mean anything less in the light of these contiguous facts? Does it mean anything else than an attempt to get additional compensation for certain steam-ship lines that can be numbered on your ten fingers?

We have but little outward commerce. These lines are known and well established. One word just here so far as that commerce is concerned. We have been told as to the Brazilian mails that the Brazilian mails are in the interest of this commerce. We have an enormous trade there—the coffee trade. What is the situation in reference to that? These cheap steamers, sometimes designated "tramps," hunting all over the world for trade, are bringing the coffee to this country instead of your Brazilian lines. You may subsidize as many of them as you please; you will have the same situation. The restrictions on trade will in a large measure regulate that.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman explain how it is that the "tramp" vessels get that trade instead of the regular lines?

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Illinois asks me how it is the tramps get that trade instead of the regular lines. The Italian Government, the French Government, the German Government, and I believe Spain also, now by a system of bounties and navigation laws have overstimulated the construction of ships until the trade is oversupplied; many of them are lying up with nothing to do, and others are creeping into every harbor hoping to get trade. It is just that condition of the commerce of the world that makes it impossible for us to get the business.

Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] I reserve the balance of his time, asking to be allowed to print a number of tables, which it is impossible for me in the time allowed to read to the House.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1888.

SIR: Inclosed herewith I have the honor to transmit two tables showing trans-Atlantic service, and the postage rates applicable to letters dispatched to foreign countries with which this country maintained a direct service by American vessels during the period of 1858 to 1888, respectively.

The tables I sent you sometime ago contained the statement of the lines (foreign and domestic) plying between the United States and Central and South America and the West Indies, the length of route, the number of trips performed, and the weights of the mails conveyed, and a table showing the amount actually paid and the amount that would have been paid if they had received the sum of $1 per mile during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887.

The same tables were transmitted to you by the Postmaster-General in his letter dated July 2, 1888, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, July 4, 1888, and the tables may be found on page 6396 of this session.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

_____,
Superintendent Foreign Mails.

Hon. J. H. BLOUNT,
Chairman Post-Offices and Post-Roads,

NICHOLAS M. BELL,
Superintendent Foreign Mails.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Office of Foreign Mails, July 9, 1888.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1888.

SIR: In answer to your verbal request to be informed as to the increased cost to the Government by reason of the payment to American steam-ship companies the total sea and inland postage on the United States mails conveyed to foreign countries as compared with the cost of the service when only the sea postage was paid, and also as to the compensation of vessels conveying United States mails prior to the acts of March 3, 1845 and 1847, respectively, I have the honor to invite your attention to the following, namely:

1. Pages 645 and 646 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1884, wherein you will see that the trans-Pacific service cost in the year 1884 (when the companies received only the sea postage on the mails conveyed) the sum of $19,125.78.

On page 1007 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1887, the trans-Pacific service cost $38,465.49. The American steamers plying in this service received both the sea and inland postage, and part of the steamers being of foreign build and register received the sea postage only.

As will be seen from page 646 the miscellaneous service was paid in 1884 $37,132.69, while by reference to page 1008 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1887, it will be seen that this same service cost the Government $51,416.44. Both of these tables include foreign as well as American built steamers. In the table on page 646 of the Postmaster-General's report for 1884 is included the Cuban and Mexican service, which cost about $18,000, fully one-half of the total cost of the Central and South American service.

The Cuban service was transferred, in 1885, from this office to the domestic service (Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General); and since that date (1885) the mails for Mexico have been forwarded almost exclusively, overland, by rail. If this service had been transferred prior to that time the cost of the service would have been, instead of $37,000, less than $18,000, and in making the comparison, therefore, between the payment of both the sea and inland postage, and the payment of the sea postage only, you should compare the sum of $18,000 with that of $51,416.44.

2. Prior to the acts of Congress of March 3, 1845 and 1847, respectively (see Laws and Regulations for the Government of the Post-Office Department of 1843, page 16: Subject, "Postage on Ship and Steam-boat Letters.") vessels sailing from the ports of the United States with mail matter, received no compensation for the conveyance of such matter to the ports of destination, as the compensation for such conveyance was paid by the country of destination of the mails which received them.

The act of 1825 provided as follows (section 34), namely:

"For every letter received by a deputy postmaster at a seaport to be conveyed to a foreign country, there shall be paid to the deputy postmaster 1 cent."

Section 18 of the act of 1825 provides as follows, namely:

"The master (except of a foreign packet) is to be paid 2 cents for each letter and package delivered by him."

NICHOLAS M. BELL,
Superintendent Foreign Mails.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., July 12, 1888.

SIR: In answer to your verbal request to be informed as to the persons composing the directories of the Pacific Mail and also of the United States and Brazil Mail Steam-ship Companies, I have the honor to state that this office is advised as to the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company that their directors were elected on the 31st of May, 1888, Mr. George Gould being afterward elected president. The directors chosen at that time were as follows, namely: Jay Gould, Sidney Dillon, Russell Sage, C. P. Huntington, Henry Hart, William Remsen, Edward Lauterbach, Harvey Kennedy, George J. Gould.

As to the United States and Brazil Mail Steam-ship Company, Mr. H. K. Thurber is president of the board of directors, which is composed of Mr. Huntington and others.

SIR: In reply to your verbal request to be informed as to whether the Houston line of steamers recently subsidized by the Government of the Argentine Republic had commenced operations or not, I have the honor to inform you that this Department has recently been officially advised that this line of steamers is nearly ready to commence operations, and that it will carry the flag of the Argentine Republic.

The communication on file relative to the matter is dated at Buenos Ayres, on the 3d of May, 1888, and was received on the 8th of June. This line of steamers is subsidized by the Government of the Argentine Republic for the sum of $87,000, and the company is to make thirteen round trips per annum from Buenos Ayres to New York.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NICHOLAS M. BELL,
Superintendent Foreign Mails.

ANTI-SUBSIDY RESOLUTION.

JANUARY 28, 1878.

Mr. John H. Baker moved that the rules be suspended, so as to enable him to submit and the House to agree to the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That in the judgment of the House no subsidies in money, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit, should be granted or renewed by Congress to associations or corporations engaged in or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises; but that all appropriations ought to be limited to such amounts and purposes only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service of the Government."

Which was agreed to—yeas 126, nays 85.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] would meet the question raised by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to the postal appropriation bill on its merits, and not by the ingenious, diverting cry of "subsidy" and "bounty," or by animadversions against the Senate proposition for which it is proposed to substitute one entirely different.

Whatever views gentlemen may entertain of the wisdom or unwisdom of the "subsidy" policy by which Great Britain has circled the globe with her steam-ship lines, or whatever objections might be raised to the Senate proposition, or whatever animadversions may be made against large appropriations to one company in the past, they ought not to affect the House in the decision of the simple question presented by the amendment, which involves only fair and reasonable mail pay—not "subsidies"—for American steam-ships; pay sufficient to justly compensate the American steam-ships which ply to the countries of this continent south of the United States, and of the East, and enable them to be maintained; and pay sufficient to make it possible for the establishment of other American lines to run to those countries of South America with which we desire to establish closer postal and commercial communications.

Under the law as it exists to-day the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to American steam-ships for the transportation of our mails to South and Central America, the West Indies, and the East an amount equivalent only to the sea and inland postage without regard to the distance they are carried. When this basis of compensation was fixed in 1858 the sea and inland postage was on the average four times what it is to-day.

Under the law as it would be if the amendment to the Senate paragraph proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which I heartily approve, should become a law, the Postmaster-General is authorized to contract to pay American steam-ships, not only existing lines, but also such new lines as the Postmaster-General may desire to have established, carrying our mails to South and Central America and the West Indies, and China and Japan and Australasia, in addition to the present compensation, a sum not exceeding three times the sea and inland postage. Such steam-ships to conform their sailings and their trips to schedules furnished by the Post-Office Department.

It will be seen, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives substantially the same basis of payment as was provided by the act of 1858, for the reason that the rate of sea and inland postage is on the average scarcely more than one-fourth what it was at that time.

The Postmaster-General, in a letter to the chairman of the Postal Committee [Mr. BLOUNT], published in the RECORD, has indicated various objections to the proposition to improve our South and Central American mail service as inserted in the pending bill by the Senate; but the amendment presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania obviates these objections, and conforms to a plan for improving this service and increasing the compensation recommended by Superintendent Bell of the foreign mail service, and printed in the last report (page 1011) of the Postmaster-General, and according to a statement made in the Senate having the approval of the present Postmaster-General. Indeed, I am disappointed to find my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] opposing the amendment, because it is a copy of a proposition introduced into the House early in the session by that distinguished gentleman. I am not without hope, however, that before this debate closes he will be found supporting a measure so obviously just and necessary.

The gentleman from Georgia has quoted from the Postmaster-General's communication a single sentence, in which it is claimed that the distinguished head of the Post-Office Department represents our South and Central American postal service as ample and satisfactory without further legislation or increased compensation. It is obvious from the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, to which I have already referred, that the Postmaster-General could not have intended to be thus understood. The Superintendent of Foreign Mails, who has immediate knowledge of the situation, says:

> The Central and South American service is as good as can be obtained under the present system of dispatching mails by vessels "when loaded." Frequently vessels tendered to the Department to convey these mails on a certain day sail several days before or after the time appointed, to the annoyance and inconvenience of correspondents. I have to suggest, as one means of correcting this evil, that if the Postmaster-General were authorized by law to allow an additional compensation, over and above that now allowed to vessels engaged in this service (upon the basis of the weights of the mails conveyed), a system of premiums and penalties might be mutually agreed upon by this Department and steam-ship companies, which would make it to the advantage of the steam-ship companies to adhere closely to their scheduled sailing dates, whereby the efficiency of the service would be materially increased and the commercial interests of the country benefited.

The late Postmaster-General recognized the necessity of improving our mail connection with South America by a line of steam-ships running from New York to the ports of the Argentine Republic, with which we now have no regular direct communication, for in his last report he called attention to an offer of that Republic to give $100,000 per annum to establish direct steam-ship communication with the United States, and recommended action by Congress looking to co-operation on our part. The gentleman from Georgia states that the Argentine Republic has concluded an arrangement for a British line to New York. We have now only a monthly service to Brazil, a semi-monthly service to Venezuela, and only irregular service by foreign vessels to any other country of South America. Altogether our postal and commercial communications with South America are insufficient and unsatisfactory.

It may be true, as the gentleman from Georgia says, that our existing laws and appropriations might prove entirely adequate to afford whatever foreign mail service we desire if we are to act on the policy that it is of no consequence to the American people whether the steam-ships which carry our mails and transport our exports and imports are foreign vessels that may be turned against us in case of war or American vessels bearing our country's flag, proclaiming our country's power and prestige, advertising our country's products, and ready to respond to our country's call for aid in the defense of her honor and independence.

For the transportation of our trans-Atlantic mails we paid last year $160,333 to six British steam-ship lines, $142,075 to two German lines, and $11,606 to the French line, but nothing to an American line, for the reason that the view which regards it of no consequence whether our mails and our commerce are carried by foreign or by American vessels controlled our policy, while all the foreign nations have acted on the theory that power and prestige and trade follow the flag that floats at the peak of the ship.

Even for the transportation of our mails to the countries of South and Central America and the West Indies we paid last year to American steam-ships only $39,371, divided as follows: To the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company, for the service between New York and Colon during the fiscal year 1887—the fiscal year which terminated one year ago this month—we paid $15,340.62. We paid the same steam-ship company, for service between San Francisco and Panama, $1,833. We paid to the New York, Havana and Mexican Steam-ship Company, for service between New York and Vera Cruz, $399.03. We paid the steam-ship company that carries the mail between Key West and Nassau—the name of the owners not given—$228.37. We paid to what is known as the "Red D Line," between New York and Laguayra, $4,457.47. We paid the New Orleans and Central American Steam-ship Company, for service between New Orleans and Port Limon, $195.12. We paid Hoadley & Co.'s steamers, for service between New York and Colon, $23.39. We paid Oteri's line, between New Orleans and Truxillo, $199.55; to the Royal Mail Steam-ship Company, between New Orleans and Belize, $3,887.77; to the steam-ships connecting us with the Haytian Republic, between New York and Cape Hayti, $205.30; to the United States and Brazil Steam-ship Company, for service between New York and Rio de Janeiro, $10,804.35; to the Morgan Line, for service between New Orleans and Vera Cruz, $67.50; to the same line, for service between New Orleans and Havana, $192.81; to steamers plying between New York and Bermuda, $10.79; to the Clyde Line, between New York and San Domingo, $960.08; to Leaycraft & Co.'s steamers, between New York and Cape Hayti, $30.32; to the steamer Alert, for service between New York and Cape Hayti, $79.42; to the New York and Cuba Mail Steam-ship Company, between New York and Santiago, $124.88, and to the same line, between New York and Nassau, $331.48.

To the American line running from New York to the ports of Brazil, it will be observed, we paid the munificent compensation of $10,804, or $750 per round trip of 10,500 miles; and the line is barely maintained by the $80,000 which it receives for transporting the Brazilian mails to the United States and its receipts for freight and passenger traffic. I do not wonder that the owners of the only American steam-ship line running from the ports of the United States to any country of South America south of Venezuela are becoming discouraged in view of the increasing competition to which they are subjected by foreign steamers, and what my lively friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] characterized as "the salutary neglect of the Government." The "neglect" is apparent; and I have no doubt that when this solitary American steam-ship line, floating the Stars and Stripes in South American ports south of Venezuela, shall have been driven from the ocean, there will be gentlemen to point to the fact that a British line has taken its place and is carrying our mail for a less sum per trip than is now paid our Brazilian line as proof of the "salutary" character of our policy toward American steam-ships.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not disturb him.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask for information. I understand the position taken is that these appropriations are not intended as subsidies?

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely; they are simply fair mail compensation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No light has been given us as to how these lines are progressing; as to what dividends they are paying. I want to ask if these payments are essential to the life of the lines?

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly. It is undoubtedly true that unless something shall be done to increase the mail compensation of the American steam-ship lines that are now running from this country to South and to Central America, and to the East, before five years there will not be a single American steam-ship line left.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Is there a steam-ship line now established running to the Argentine Republic?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not any, although the gentleman from Georgia has said the Argentine Republic has made arrangements with a British company to put on a line.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My point is this: It seems to me to be conceded that we are paying more for carrying mails than the rate for carrying freight and express packages.

If the lines, although paid at a more liberal rate than for this other class of service, can not be kept up and maintained on business principles, then are we not confronted with the proposition that we have to subsidize or give bounty in order to keep the lines alive? I want that matter put upon its true basis.

Mr. DINGLEY. That depends entirely upon what you may call a subsidy or bounty. Allow me to say that there are three elements in the revenue of every steam-ship line which maintains itself: first, the compensation received for the transportation of freight; second, the compensation received for the transportation of passengers; and third, the compensation received for the transportation of mails. Now, the American lines of American steam-ships running to South and Central America can not be maintained with simply the receipts for the transportation of passengers and the transportation of freight.

The routes are long, and at present the revenue from these sources is inadequate to maintain these lines. The American-Brazilian line, for example, has been struggling along with its revenues from passengers and freight and $80,000 a year from Brazil for the transportation of her mails, and scarcely paying its bills, not paying last year a single cent of profit to the owners. Unquestionably if the Government of the United States can not afford to pay something more for the transportation of her mails the American-Brazilian line must be withdrawn before long, and a British line would ultimately take its place. That is the situation which confronts us in this matter. In determining what is fair mail pay we must take into consideration what are the receipts of the vessels for the transportation of passengers and freight, and must supplement that with a sufficient amount, reasonable in itself, not going beyond the amount that is provided in this bill, namely, four times the sea and inland postage, which would give the Brazilian line only $55,000. That is all that is provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. Even though the Postmaster-General should give the Brazilian line the utmost sum provided by this bill, it would be only $55,000 instead of $10,800 at present.

Now, I am sure gentlemen will see that $55,000, the extent to which the Postmaster-General can pay under this provision, is low mail transportation and lower than we are paying coastwise steamers for their service.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman please tell us where he gets his financial information as to the condition of the Brazil line?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have to take it from the statements that the owners of the line have put forth. Of course I do not know anything about it personally, but I think the gentleman will find the statement correct.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Have you any information as to the dividends of the Pacific Mail Line or the Brazil Line?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have noticed in the papers that the Pacific Mail paid 5 per cent. last year, but I understand from other statements which I have seen that they have not been able to make any dividend this year.

Mr. BINGHAM. The stock is quoted in the market at 34, the par being 100, and it pays no dividend.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should be pleased to be interrupted to any reasonable extent, but gentlemen will bear in mind that there are other members who desire to speak, and I must not trench upon their time.

I have no doubt that British steam-ship lines would cheerfully enter into a contract to carry our South American and China and Australian mails without compensation if we would withdraw our steam ships running to those countries. Indeed, within the past year the Governments of Canada and Great Britain, notwithstanding our Pacific line furnished them ample mail facilities, have voted a subsidy of $300,000 per annum to establish and maintain a British steam-ship line running from British Columbia to China and Japan and touching at San Francisco, with the almost openly avowed purpose of driving off the American line from San Francisco, crippling our growing trade with the East, and strengthening the naval and military power of Canada as a check on the United States. I think there is no doubt that Great Britain and Canada would be glad to carry our China and Japan mails gratuitously, on the condition that the American line be withdrawn. Why not, if it makes no difference whether our mails and commerce are carried by foreign or American vessels?

It may be said—it has been said—that we now give American steamships three and a half times as much for carrying letters, and nearly twice as much for carrying papers outside of our trans-Atlantic mails, as we give foreign steamers, and that this is ample. It is true that we do give American steam-ships about 5c ents each for transporting letters without regard to distance, and foreign steam-ships about 1½ cents. But this difference of compensation, computed on the basis of letters and papers carried, amounts to very little on the lines outside of the great trans-Atlantic routes where the mails are large. Indeed, it works to the advantage of the foreign lines which control the latter routes. On this basis last year the British Cunard line received 65 cents per mile one way for transporting our mails, while the American-Brazilian line received but 14 cents. On the steam-ship routes of this continent and on the Pacific the mails are comparatively small, the distance to be steamed great, and the compensation even at 5 cents per letter almost nothing. What consolation is it to the American steam-ship line running from New York to Brazil, a distance of 5,500 miles, to be told that the $10,804 per annum, or the $750 per trip, which they receive for carrying the United States mail is made up at the rate of sea and inland postage, or 5 cents per letter, while a British line would receive only sea postage, or 1½ cents per letter, or less than $3,000 per annum?

Mr. Speaker, it is simply shameful—and I measure my words when I say it—it is shameful that this great Government of sixty-two millions of people, rich, powerful, and rightfully seeking to strengthen its prestige on the ocean as well as on the land, should maintain a basis of compensation to American steamships for carrying our mails which works out such results as I have referred to. It ought to be evident to every candid mind that the basis of sea and inland postage on letters carried, without regard to distance, as a measure of compensation is wrong, and is doing American steamers a grave injustice; for it costs a vessel but little more to carry two hundred sacks of mail matter than it does ten sacks. We do not compensate our internal mail transportation on the sole basis of weight of mail. We do not compensate even the steamers carrying our river and coast mails solely on the basis of number of letters or weight of mail, but on the length of the route also. Why should not we deal on the same terms with our citizens who are endeavoring to maintain American prestige on the ocean in the face of open and overwhelming foreign competition, and provide for increased compensation for transportation of our foreign mails by American steamships where the routes are long and the mail light?

The Post-Office Department, in the last year that the report of the Postmaster-General gave the compensation, paid the American coastwise steamers which convey our mails between Port Townsend and Tacoma $29,700. The distance traveled one way was a little over 28,000 miles per annum, or $1 per mile. Nobody ever complained that this was unjust "subsidy."

Yet when the New York and Brazilian line asks to have the miserable pittance of 14 cents per mile which it receives increased to 56 cents per mile one way, or $55,000 per annum, all that would be allowed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the modest request is met with the cry of "subsidy."

The Post-Office Department paid a few years ago, and I presume it is doing the same now, and doing it properly, $18,000 to the small steamers running between Baltimore and Norfolk for carrying the mail, but really more for commercial purposes, as there is a better mail service by rail.

I ask gentlemen also to note the fact that the Post-Office Department, by special enactment, has been able to give the Tampa and Havana steam-ship line $54,000 per annum for transporting our mails semi-weekly or tri-weekly a distance of 366 miles, and no one objects or regards it as "subsidy." Why should similar compensation to our Brazilian line for transporting our mails 5,500 miles be denounced as "subsidy?" Will the gentleman from Georgia inform the House?

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House, not to give "subsidies," as the European governments do, to establish and maintain steam-ship lines connecting with all parts of the world, but such fair compensation as will secure the establishment and maintenance of American steam-ship lines to the leading countries of Central and South America. Fair compensation is not "subsidy" in the sense in which that word is being used in this House to deter gentlemen from dealing justly with American steam-ships. We have to-day no regular direct steam communication with the Argentine Republic, notwithstanding that growing Republic has had a standing offer to pay $100,000 per annum to maintain such a line, although it is reported that that Republic will withdraw the tender because there is no disposition on the part of the United States to aid in the establishment of so desirable a means of increasing the intercourse and trade between the two republics. In the face of such opportunities, shall we longer continue the policy of neglect? With the non-manufacturing Empire of Brazil and fifteen republics, consisting of over 40,000,000 people, at our doors, sympathizing deeply with this country, and having a foreign trade of $700,000,000 annually, shall we continue to shout "subsidy" and frighten ourselves from doing what a wise statesmanship demands should be done to increase our means of postal and commercial intercourse with South and Central America?

On the basis contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Postmaster-General would be authorized, if he thought proper, to increase the compensation of the twenty-one American lines, which last year received the miserable pittance of only $44,474 for transporting our mails to South and Central America and the West Indies, to not exceeding four times that sum, or $165,897, on the basis of last year's mail matter, or, with the probable increase of mail matter, about $200,000, on the condition that the service shall be improved. This would enable the Postmaster-General to give the Brazilian line not exceeding $53,000, the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company about $92,000 over their line from New York to Colon, the New Orleans and Belize line about $18,000, the Venezuela line about $21,000, and the other lines smaller sums, all according to the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

If the Australian and China and Japan lines are included, to which we paid last year $38,465 (including $20,000 paid to the Oceanic Line), probably about $100,000 more would be required, leaving a balance of $150,000 to be used in establishing a new line to the Argentine Republic and increasing the frequency of the service to other points.

"Subsidies" are not proposed by the pending amendment, yet it may be of interest to look for a moment at what Europe is doing. No nation of Europe has ever originally established steam-ship lines to connect with foreign countries without liberal mail-pay from the Government. It has been frequently asserted that Great Britain has not done this. The official records, however, prove that England was the pioneer of this policy on the most liberal scale, and that France, Germany, Italy, and Spain have imitated her example. To settle this point beyond question, however, two years ago I addressed a note of inquiry to the late Capt. Bedford Pim, recognized everywhere as an English authority on all matters relating to the British marine, and I received from him a prompt reply on this point, in which he said:

> It has been the policy of the British Government to establish or rather encourage the establishment of British steam-ship lines by the annual payment of a postal subsidy, and this with the most gratifying results as regards the expansion of British commerce. I know of no instance of a British postal line of steamers originally established without a subsidy for carrying the mails.

Now that Great Britain has obtained possession of most of the important lines of steam-ship communication with foreign countries, she has no need of dispensing her largesses with so liberal a hand as formerly—largesses amounting to $250,000,000 in the last forty-five years; but the mail compensation she still gives so many of her steam-ship lines shows that she continues to jealously guard this important agency in the development of her foreign trade.

Only last year she joined Canada in giving a subsidy of $300,000 per annum to establish a steam-ship line between British Columbia and China and Japan. And it is a mistake to suppose that Great Britain has confined this policy to steam-ship lines connecting her ports with her colonies, for this has not been the case, as Captain Pim's statement authoritatively shows. Indeed, the first British steam-ship line connecting the ports of Great Britain with Brazil was established by the aid not only of postal subsidies but also of a Government guaranty of 8 per cent. profit to the company undertaking the enterprise.

From the annual report of the British postmaster-general I take the following statement of the amounts paid by Great Britain to steam-ship lines, almost entirely British, for foreign mail service, and the amounts paid each line by the Government in excess of the receipts for postage:

Steam-ship lines.	Payments.	Excess of payments over postal receipts.
Australia	(*)
Brazil	$60,825
Cape of Good Hope	(†)
Alexandria and Cyprus	39,255	$38,500
East Indies and China	1,793,000	1,023,000
East coast of Africa	31,120	29,000
West coast of Africa	41,990	10,000
Dover and Ostend	80,585
Malta and Messina	7,500
United States	462,615	250,000
Bermuda and Jamaica	87,500	82,500
Panama and Valparaiso	13,285
West Indies and Mexico	420,115	263,000
Total	3,039,830	1,707,000

*Paid to Australia. †Paid by colony.

In addition the British Government is paying a subsidy to a new line running from British Columbia to China and Japan.

Previous to 1875 the British Government paid annually from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 to steam-ships for ocean mail service, an amount from two to three millions in excess of her revenue from foreign postage. Nearly all of this sum was paid British steam-ship lines. France pays her mail steam-ships over four and a half millions annually, Italy nearly two millions, Austria one million, Spain one million, Germany $950,000, and even little Holland over $300,000.

Mr. Speaker, while I am gratified to learn from the statement made in the Senate that the distinguished Postmaster-General approves the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania looking to the maintenance of American steam-ship lines and better postal service between our ports and the ports of the countries south of us, yet I regret that in his published letter in which he discusses the Senate proposition he should have gone out of his way to connect this important subject of better postal and commercial communication with South and Central America with the tariff dispute in such a way as to lead many gentlemen who do not stop to carefully inquire into the subject to infer that it is one phase of the great issue which divides parties, when in fact it is a purely patriotic and business question which should equally interest all good citizens.

Says the Postmaster-General:

> Of course England may subsidize lines of ships to open up new markets for her surplus, because she freely exchanges commodities with such markets, and her policy is after establishing the commerce to steadily decrease the subsidy. If the policy of giving bounties to promote commercial relations with other countries be ever adopted again after the failures in our history, it would seem that its adoption should be deferred until closer commercial relations with those countries can be maintained, and are not antagonized by an opposing system of laws. Commerce in the very essence of its meaning is exchange. It is not to sell and never to buy. The individual or nation does not exist that will buy all one has to sell for cash with no reciprocal return in profitable exchange. Cargoes out and cargoes back are needed for the creation of a merchant marine. The cargo out will not be bought unless we buy in exchange, and it will be bought if we are willing to trade.

Inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia has repeated this statement silence might be construed as an approval of the economic views so confidently affirmed by the distinguished Postmaster-General and the gentleman from Georgia. I shall be pardoned for briefly digressing from the subject before us to point out what seems to me to be substantial grounds for regarding them as theories which have been disproved by commercial facts.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the Postmaster-General should affirm, as if it were a settled commercial fact, that one nation will buy of another only as it can sell to that other nation, in the face of his own statistics of our trade with South America, which shows exactly the contrary.

The tables submitted by the Postmaster-General show that last year we bought of Brazil products of the value of $52,955,591, and yet that we sold to Brazil products of the United States only to the value of $8,137,794; that we bought of Central America products of the value of $7,706,978, and sold only $3,006,714.

What becomes of the "barter" theory of the Postmaster-General in the face of the actual facts of our foreign trade, which show that nations buy where they find the prices and the means of communication most advantageous without regard to whether they can make an exchange of products? As a matter of fact the United States is the largest buyer of South and Central America and West India products. We are endeavoring to improve our means of communication so as to sell them more. The trouble with our trade with South America is not, as the Postmaster-General supposes, that we do not buy of them, but that they do not buy of us as much as they would if there were better communication.

The suggestion of the Postmaster-General that our exports to South American countries are restricted by the fact that we impose duties on their products finds a sufficient answer in his own tables, which show that, notwithstanding we impose no duty on the chief product of Brazil, to wit, coffee, yet we exported to that empire last year articles to the value of only $8,137,794, in the face of the fact that we imported from Brazil products to the value of $47,076,473, on which we imposed no duty, $36,401,864 being coffee; while Great Britain, which imposes a heavy duty on coffee, exported to Brazil articles to the value of $33,460,531.

Neither is there any basis for the Postmaster-General's assumption that the revenue-tariff policy before the war promoted our foreign trade, and the protective policy since the war destroyed it, which, I presume, is what he means when he says that we must defer steps to promote commercial relations with South America until we have got rid of "an opposing system of laws."

If the distinguished gentleman had consulted the official statistics he would have found that our foreign commerce has been much larger per inhabitant since the war, under protection, than before the war, under a revenue tariff. In the revenue-tariff period, between 1846 and 1861, our annual imports averaged $10.73 per inhabitant, and our exports, $9.94 per inhabitant; annual foreign commerce, $20.67 per inhabitant. But in the protective tariff decade, between 1871 and 1881, our annual imports averaged $13.50 per capita and our exports $14.93; annual foreign trade, $28.43 per inhabitant.

It will be observed that our foreign commerce was 40 per cent. larger per capita under protection than under a tariff for revenue only. Could there be a more complete refutation of the assumption that a protective tariff destroys foreign trade? Indeed, our foreign commerce since the war has increased much more rapidly than that of Great Britain, whose policy is supposed to be peculiarly favorable to foreign trade. Even including the war period, when our foreign trade was so seriously crippled, the official statistics show that the foreign commerce of the United States increased 95 per cent. between 1860 and 1885, while the foreign commerce of Great Britain increased only 83 per cent., and that of France only 80 per cent.

Even our trade with the countries of South America, which the Postmaster-General cites as an illustration of his point, has increased beyond the growth of our population, notwithstanding we have not taken measures to provide regular and rapid steam communication with them, as Great Britain, France, and Germany have done.

It is conceded that our imports from nearly every country of South America have increased largely. But our exports have also greatly expanded.

In 1860 we exported to the Argentine Republic under a revenue tariff articles to the value of $1,003,500; in 1887, articles to the value of $6,364,545.

In 1860 we exported to the United States of Colombia articles to the value only of $1,642,800; in 1887, articles to the value of $6,364,545.

In 1860 we exported to Venezuela articles to the value of $1,056,250; in 1887, articles to the value of $5,504,215.

To South and Central America, which trade it has been asserted we largely held under revenue tariffs, our exports in 1860 were only $17,500,000, but in 1883, $42,500,000.

Even our exports to the West India Islands have increased from $23,000,000 in 1860 to $32,250,000 in 1883.

In 1860 our exports to Russia were $2,750,000; in 1883 they were $19,000,000. In 1860 our exports to Germany were $14,750,000; in 1883, $64,250,000. In 1860 our exports to Belgium were $2,750,000; in 1883, $26,750,000. In 1860 our exports to Great Britain were $196,250,000; in 1883, $420,500,000.

Turning to the East, in 1860 our exports to Japan were $90,000; in 1883, $3,250,000. In 1860 our exports to Australia were $4,000,000; in 1883, $9,500,000.

These statistical illustrations, which I might multiply, simply show that our foreign trade with nearly every country in the world has grown under protection as never before, and therefore that the assumption of the Postmaster-General that it is no use to improve our means of communication with the countries of South America to increase our trade until we go back to a revenue tariff, has no foundation in the statistics of commerce.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the opponents of protection represent it as a Chinese wall designed to bar out foreign trade, when the fact is that its office is simply to bar out only such imported articles as we can ourselves produce or manufacture to the extent of our wants, thus so increasing the general prosperity and ability to purchase and so enlarging our productive capacity, that, taken together, we buy for our own consumption more that we do not produce and sell for the consumption of others and consume ourselves more that we do produce than any other nation on the face of the earth.

Although the foreign commerce of Great Britain appears in the statistics to be larger per capita than ours, yet this is due to the fact that she imports all the materials of her manufactures and much of the food consumed by her people in carrying on her industries, while we produce nearly all the materials, and, with the exception of sugar and rice, all the food we consume. The materials and food of Great Britain appear in her exports and imports, much of it twice; ours not at all except so far as they are exported. According to Mulhall the value of the total products of Great Britain consumed at home and exported in 1880 was $172 per inhabitant, while in the same year, according to Nimmo, the value of the products of the United States was $200 per inhabitant.

Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell longer on the question as to what tariff policy fosters our foreign and internal trade and promotes general prosperity, for that has no proper connection with the issue before us, and would not have been alluded to by me if the Postmaster-General had not imported it into this discussion. It is sufficient that our productive capacity is almost unlimited, and that the non-manufacturing countries of South and Central America and the West Indies offer us valuable markets almost at our doors, of which we can not make the most until we secure regular and direct steam communication with them for postal and commercial purposes. Nothing is better settled than that foreign trade follows the flag, and that the preservation of commercial independence demands that our own ships should be the bearers of our mails and our products. No part of our country is more interested in maintaining American lines of communication with foreign countries than the great West, for in case of war between Great Britain and another foreign power our means of transportation would be cut off.

Again, in no other way can we provide so economically for the national defense as by encouraging the establishment and maintenance of American steam-ship lines for postal and commercial uses, composed of stout ships which we can summon to our aid in time of need. The immense fleet of merchant steam-ships which England has created by her policy of postal subsidies and governmental aid, and upon which she calls when hostilities are threatened, make her the monarch of the seas.

Speaking of this subject in a letter addressed last January to the American Shipping League by one of our distinguished naval commanders, enforcing the importance of maintaining our own lines of steam-ships and our own vessels to carry our mails and our products, Admiral Porter said:

> I could produce numerous statistics to show how much has been done by foreign powers to promote the steam-ship lines which now traverse every part of the ocean. Their main object was to foster their mercantile marine and add to the strength of their navies in time of war. The United States have done literally nothing in this direction, but have forced their mercantile marine into a position whence it can only escape ruin through the strong help of the Government.
> The restoration of our mercantile marine is inseparable from the rehabilitation of our Navy. The two undertakings must go hand in hand if we wish either to succeed, and I hope the time is not far distant when the same noble spirit of nationality and patriotism which underlies the favorable sentiment in Congress toward the Navy will find expression in decided action upon this most important of all national issues.

Expenditures for the maintenance of a merchant marine for postal and commercial purposes are not bounties to any industries, but in the same line with expenditures to create a Navy and provide for the public defense and to facilitate communication for naval and commercial purposes.

We can not hope, neither would it be wise, to build a navy on the scale of that maintained by Great Britain. A moderate fleet of naval vessels of the best type, and a large fleet of swift merchant steam-ships are the best naval defense that the United States can have in time of war. Let us realize before it is too late that the seat of empire is on the rocking waves as well as the solid land.

Mr. DINGLEY. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirteen minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield it to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS.]

Mr. PETERS. I reserve that time until I can take the floor in my own right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is usually very fortunate in his references to the policy of other governments in comparison with our own, but I think he has been especially unfortunate to-day in his appeal to the experience of Great Britain in regard to this matter of subsidies. I think it is very obvious that no parellel can be drawn between Great Britain and this country in this matter of subsidies, and no reason can be urged founded on the experience of that government in favor of our adopting her policy. Great Britain, as has been often remarked on this floor, has vast outlying possessions, with oceans intervening between those possessions and the mother country; her ocean mail system is the same to her as our internal postal system is to us.

You can not speak of the transportation of the mails being a matter of subsidy in the United States, no matter what sum may be paid beyond the actual cost of the work. Whether it was a wise policy or not, at the very beginning of our history a postal system was deemed of so great importance and the diffusion of intelligence among our people so greatly to be desired, that the mail service was placed directly under the control of the Government by the Federal Constitution.

In this country the mails are to be carried in any event on the best terms that the Government can obtain. The diffusion of intelligence among our people and correspondence between them must be secured and maintained whatever may be the cost. To Great Britain, with her vast outlying possessions scattered through all the oceans, her ocean mail service like our inland system must be carried on, and she subsidizes ocean steamers for the purpose of securing regular and speedy communication between those various portions of her extended empire. This is natural enough and proper enough under that imperial system. In the case of Great Britain the excessive sums paid to steam-ships plying between her own ports is no more a subsidy than the large payments she may make for transporting mails by inland routes. Happily we have no such outlying possessions except Alaska, which is not greatly in need of postal facilities.

But again, sir, the gentleman's appeal and reference to Great Britain as a parallel to us and an example for us, does not sound well to the American ear. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] does not often make that kind of an appeal. The British system rests on subsidies. It has rested on subsidies for centuries. Subsidy is the foundation of monarchies and has been through all the ages. It is a discrimination in favor of one class, or of certain classes of the people, as against other classes, the building up of the fortunes of the few at the expense of the nation, and has in all ages resulted in the impoverishment of the many. Subsidy has always been the policy of monarchies, and always will be while monarchies exist. Such a policy gives strength to monarchical institutions, while it is fatal to the institutions of a republic, for it uniformly destroys, like monopoly, the equality of the people. I think, therefore, that on both grounds the gentleman's reference to the policy of the British Government was not a happy one.

Our people are not likely to follow the example. I think the gentleman himself would not approve it upon reflection. We can not desire for our country the results that have been produced by subsidies during the progress of ages in Great Britain and other European monarchies. Our policy is to place all classes of the people on a common basis, to open up equally to all men the opportunities for advancement, and not to single out particular classes and advance their fortunes at the expense of the many; for this is what subsidy has always done and will always do, no matter how plausible the argument may be of equal advantage.

But, sir, the amendment which has been submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] presents this subject to us in such a tangible form that we can see at a glance what this subsidy means more clearly than common, although the question has been before the House time and time again. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to bring under this subsidy system the transportation of the mails between our Pacific coast and the ports of China and Japan. What has been our experience heretofore in that respect?

As gentlemen know, our subsidy to the Collins line was a failure, and resulted in an unpleasant inquiry in this House. The only two subsidies that were not subject of unfavorable comment and protest, but which produced no good results to any one except the capitalists who owned the ships, were the subsidy to the line from New York to Brazil and the subsidy to the line from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands; the one $150,000, the other $75,000 per year, and both abandoned when the contracts expired, They opened up no new trade. We simply gave a few gentlemen about a million of dollars, that was all.

But the subsidy for the line from San Francisco to China and Japan presents the whole subject in its proper and natural light. Whether the subsidy be for an industry between our country and foreign nations or an industry in our own midst, the results are the same. When in 1865 you subsidized the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company with a bonus of $500,000 a year, there soon sprang up upon the same route between San Francisco and China and Japan another line, running in competition with the subsidized line, but without a dollar of subsidy. While the one line was subsidized and the other not, both were engaged in the same commercial ventures, running, I believe, the same number of vessels between the different ports they visited.

One of those lines—I speak now of the subject of subsidizing with the view to building up American industry or advancing the fortunes of American citizens—one of those lines, the Occidental and Oriental, was owned by American capitalists though sailing under a foreign flag, while the very line which was subsidized, though running under the American flag, was, in the main, a foreign corporation, its capital being held mainly abroad, so that in fact we were granting a subsidy in the interest of foreign capitalists as against American capitalists. So much upon the subject of building up our commerce in this way, and so much for the patriotism involved. It is well known that our capitalists are engaged in any number of carrying enterprises throughout the world, their vessels going under foreign flags. I remember that as far back as 1872, upon an inquiry directed by this House, the fact was disclosed that even then several vessels were being built on the Clyde for American capitalists to be run under the British flag. So much for the question of patriotism as involved in this matter.

In referring to our experience on this subject of subsidies generally, I have spoken of the Collins line, the other two instances being quite unimportant, and the subsidies mere gifts of money to fortunate gentlemen. Sir, if it is proposed to extend this subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steam-ship line I am not willing that the House shall so soon forget or overlook the fact that one of the most humiliating spectacles ever presented on the floor of this House was in connection with a subsidy to that steam-ship line. I desire the Clerk to read a resolution adopted by this House on the 20th of February, 1873.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, in the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee of this House, in reference to certain matters committed to said committee for investigation, it has been sworn by Le Grand Lockwood, of New York City, that a large sum of money was used to secure the passage through Congress of an increased annual appropriation to the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company, in the nature of a subsidy, for the transportation of mails and other purposes: Therefore,

Resolved, That said Committee on Ways and Means are hereby authorized and directed to make full inquiry into the truth or falsity of said sworn statement, and to this end the said committee is hereby authorized and directed to send for persons and papers, and generally to exercise such powers and discretion as will be necessary thereto.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution just read was the foundation of an inquiry which resulted in the most startling disclosures. The result of the inquiry was reported to the House by Mr. Kasson, of Iowa. Mark you, the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company, for the purpose, as it was said, of affording increased facilities for the transportation of mails to the countries of the East, had obtained a subsidy of $500,000 a year in 1865 for ten years. While that subsidy was still in operation, and several years before it had expired (for the contract ran for a period of ten years), this movement was made to increase the subsidy to a million of dollars a year for the unexpired term and $500,000 a year for the residue of the ten years; so rapidly do these movements in the interest of subsidies travel when once fairly set on foot. What was the result of that investigation? It is shown in the following statement from the report of Mr. Kasson, on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, who investigated the subject:

With the exception of some small sums paid directly by Stockwell, the total amount disbursed by his direction in connection with the legislation referred to appears to have been retained by or disbursed through the hands of said Irwin, and to have amounted to about $890,000. The committee ascertained the names of the parties to whom payments were made by Irwin to the amount of $703,100, and a list of all these recipients of prospective subsidy is given.

One of the persons to whom payment was made was William S. King, of Minnesota, Postmaster of this House, who had been elected as a member of Congress, but who never took his seat. Mr. King, who, according to the report, received $125,000, was, at the time these events transpired, Postmaster of this House, and up to the time of these disclosures had been so highly honored that he had been elected a Representative from Minnesota; but, as appears from this report, he fled the country for the purpose of avoiding the consequences of his infamous acts in behalf of this corporation.

John G. Schumaker, who was at the time a member of this House, received, according to the report, $300,000 in two payments, one of $275,000, and one of $25,000. How he distributed this money the committee could not ascertain. So that here in this House, when this subsidy system had been fairly inaugurated, an officer and a member of the House received the sum of $425,000 corruptly and left this House forever, dishonored, reflecting discredit upon this body and upon the country at large. Is it desirable that a policy like this should be encouraged by the American Congress?

Mr. HOOKER. What is the date of that report?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a report made to this House on the 27th of February, 1875. Now it is proposed that this very same company, the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company, largely a foreign corporation, shall in direct terms, under the amendment now pending, receive the benefit of a portion of this subsidy. Can this House, with a proper regard to a just public opinion, and in the face of this infamous record, subsidize again the company that by such corrupt practices brought shame and dishonor upon the country? Congress, of course, in 1875, hastened to repeal the former subsidy. Will this Congress revive it?

The Occidental and Oriental Company has run without a dollar of subsidy, carrying your mails between San Francisco and China and Japan, and carrying them, too, when the Pacific Mail refused to carry them, when Postmaster-General Vilas so wisely refused to give it a part of the subsidy you voted in the Forty-eighth Congress. The people honor him for never expending a dollar of that subsidy. Yet we are proposing, and I think my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] must have overlooked this extraordinary requirement, we are deliberately proposing that the Pacific Mail shall receive subsidies from the Treasury of the United States, although through the seductive and corrupting measures taken by that company the country was disgraced and the names of at least two men connected with this House were covered with infamy.

I think the subject of subsidy is not one the American citizen can contemplate with pleasure, even when subsidies were apparently given necessarily for the high purpose of more firmly uniting the States of the Atlantic and Pacific in the midst of war. The Government felt when granting a subsidy of public bonds toward the construction of the Pacific railroads it did it from necessity for the public good and because it would inure directly to the benefit of the people. Yet even then the fruits of subsidy were national dishonor, and two once honored members of this House left it with blighted reputations, never to return. I say, therefore, that the experience we have had on the subject of subsidies would lead us to avoid them hereafter as an evil too great even to be gravely considered.

But gentlemen say this is not a subsidy. Not a subsidy, sir! Why, gentlemen, you are now paying four times as much to the American ships for transporting your mails abroad as you pay to foreign ships; you pay them four times larger compensation than they receive for transportation of express matter, while the safety of the latter is insured by the ship company and your mails involve no insurance. Gentlemen seem to think carrying a package for the United States ought to stand on a different footing than carrying a package for anybody else. You pay now four times as much for carrying a package by an American ship for the United States as it would receive for corresponding express matter carried a corresponding distance, while in the latter case the safety of the package is secured and its safety guarantied by the ship company and not in the former.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is generally admitted by all men that we have at the head of the Post-Office Department a gentleman whose ability and capacity furnish a high guaranty that your great Postal Department is and will be wisely administered. Gentlemen on both sides of the House have expressed their confidence in the chief of that Department. He has been referred to by gentlemen only in terms of respect for the success and efficiency with which he administers the duties of his office. Now, the Postmaster-General, in the able and conclusive letter before you, says, so far as the subsidy system is concerned as here proposed, that it would simply embarrass him and embarrass that great Department in the execution of the law. Can you afford to do that under the pretense of reviving American commerce? If you must and will grant subsidies, then do it in direct terms. Do not embarrass the Post-Office Department in carrying our mails between this country and other countries. Do not embarrass this great Department of the Government by granting a subsidy merely for the purpose of building up the fortunes of a few men at the expense of the Treasury of the United States.

I will refer for a moment to an additional fact. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who is generally so frank and so fair, stated to the House that we are paying more to foreign vessels for transporting the mails than we are paying to American vessels, when in fact we are paying to American vessels for any given postal service four times as much as we pay to foreign vessels. It can not be expected that we will pay as much for carrying a single letter as we pay for carrying ten thousand letters. We pay, of course, according to the service as far as practicable, not only in our postal service, but in all the service of the Government. We pay simply according to the work done, and it can not be expected that we will pay for carrying a dozen letters as much as we will pay for carrying one hundred thousand. Payment is made upon the basis of the service rendered, and nothing more can be justly asked of the Government.

Can the American ship-owner ask for more? He gets four times as much as the foreign vessels for doing precisely the same thing. Is not that enough? There is no justice to the country in Congress submitting to such a demand as is here made on pretense of an efficient postal service merely for the purpose of building up the fortunes of a few men who come here and demand it. It would not be tolerated for one moment in any other business.

The statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] shows the House the character and the class of men and their conduct in the past in reference to this matter of subsidy, but I do not think this House will consent for one moment to build up the fortunes in this way of such men or any other. I am sure the men who were engaged in the Pacific Mail subsidy in 1875 are not those whose fortune this House should be prompt to enhance in the way which is here proposed. The true American idea is different from that of Great Britain, where the granting of subsidies has built up great estates, vast wealth, and blighted the whole land with a hopeless and impoverished people.

The absence, happily, of the subsidy theory in our form of government and its practice in our country has built up a widely-diffused wealth which is the pride and the glory of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. What is your theory as to the best manner of building up the commerce of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is growing every year.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Well, our merchant marine?

Mr. HOLMAN. The condition is simply this: that when American capitalists find it better and more profitable to engage in the carrying trade than to invest their money in the countless enterprises within the limits of the United States, you will find that business reviving, and not before. It is a cosmopolitan employment and you can not make it local.

You can monopolize the coastwise trade; it justly and fairly belongs to American-built ships. But when you go into the foreign carrying trade, you must of necessity come into competition with all the sea-faring nations of the world; and your carrying trade will never be revived until it affords a more profitable field of employment than can be found in other avenues of commercial and business life.

That is manifestly the trouble. Our capitalists demand large profits on their ventures, and although the change from wooden to iron ships produced extraordinary results in former years, it is manifest that for twenty years our carrying trade has not revived because our citizens found better investment for their money in other pursuits, and because as is shown by the investigation embodied in the report of 1872, to which I have referred, made by order of the House, your methods are more expensive and local taxes are higher than elsewhere, although I concede that some of the cities and some of the States have reduced local taxation in the interest of the carrying trade, but as a general rule the higher taxation, and I do not refer now to taxation under the tariff, but the higher taxation to which our people are subjected interferes materially with the cost of the carrying trade of this country. But whenever it becomes profitable, as it will undoubtedly be in the progress of time, then, and not until then, will our carrying trade be revived.

It is known that the carrying trade of the world is entirely overdone. Capitalists in this field have to content themselves with small profits if they expect to successfully compete for business where all nations are competitors. But our commerce increases every year, and our capitalists in the progress of time find investments in this field of enterprise as profitable as others, and Federal and local taxes will be moderated, and then our flag will not be confined to the coastwise trade, but will appear as of old in the highways of the world's commerce.

Mr. PETERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. FELTON. I shall not attempt to discuss this question in its broadest sense, first, because I am not sufficiently well versed in it to do so, and in the second place because it has already been thoroughly discussed by others. I have listened attentively to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who has explained to us in a terse, succinct, and masterly manner the post-office phase of this question, as I shall term it. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has given us the commercial phase of it; and I have listened attentively, also, to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in reply to them both. Therefore I can add nothing to the general phase of the question, but desire to submit a few remarks upon one point, which may to some extent explain the present condition of a part of the postal mail service.

Now, sir, take the case of the Brazilian line. Its amount of tonnage is proportioned, as a matter of course, to the value of the commodities carried, and I have not the figures of the tonnage, but the commerce between the United States and Brazil is about $61,000,000 per annum. Our exports are only eight millions out of the sixty-one. The gentleman from Maine tells us that this line doing this amount of commerce, and subsidized, to use an offensive term, by the Brazilian Government in the sum of $80,000, is unable to sustain itself, is not making dividends, and will have to go down, unless some additional government aid either by this Government or by Brazil is given to it. Now, take the Australian line, which plies between the port of San Francisco and Australia and New Zealand by way of the Sandwich Islands. The total amount of commerce in this case is a trifle short of $14,000,000.

You will observe this fact, which is distinctly opposite to that of the Brazilian trade, that our exports in this amount to nearly $10,000,000, thus exceeding the imports over $5,000,000, and the amount of tonnage upon which freights can be charged to sustain this important service is only one-fifth the amount of income received by the Brazilian line. Now, it has taken twenty years to establish that commerce. It is carried in American bottoms, owned by Americans, enabled to be prosecuted by a subsidy from the Australian and New Zealand Governments amounting to $150,000 per annum, and an appropriation from the Post-Office Department of $20,000 additional. Now, sir, the further condition exists in this service that it is not a member of the Postal Union, and therefore the facts are that the Government of the United States is collecting between $40,000 and $47,000 per annum and is paying to the line but $20,000.

The Government is making, therefore, twice what it gives this line. Now, taking into consideration the amount of the tonnage and the importance of the trade, I submit to this House if it is not an ignoble policy, a policy beneath the dignity of this nation to use that line for the purpose of making money and to have it sustained by a foreign government? Any gentleman who desires to see for himself the amount of this commerce can make his own figures. It is supporting to-day, the export trade, for every working day in the year over 11,000 men at $3 per day each, and according to the usual computations we make, it is supporting a population in the United States of 55,000 people.

Now, sir, the condition is—and I know whereof I speak—that the Australian government's contract with this line expires within three months of the present time. They have become disgusted at the extreme conservative policy of this Government, to give it no worse name, and have signified their intention of giving no more assistance, unless the United States Government will meet that government, as the term is, half way. Gentlemen may think I am actuated by local or personal motives. They are entirely mistaken. Of this entire export commerce of $10,000,000 per annum less than one and one-half million is produced upon the Pacific coast. The balance is manufactures coming from one State and another throughout the entire East. Whatever may be the condition of other lines, the condition of this line is such that unless some new arrangement is made and is made before the expiration of three months, some arrangement which will at least be fair to those people, that the Government may give them what they make and what is received for their services, instead of speculating off of them, we shall lose that line and measurably that trade.

I need not tell gentlemen on this floor that it is by direct, quick, and frequent communication between countries that trade springs up and is brought to us. A merchant goes to another country with his samples and finds a customer. The banking business is arranged, credits established, and the consequence is a knowledge of the articles that we have brought to the notice of the business men of that country. They purchase and we receive the advantage.

Right here let me make one further remark. It is said by some gentlemen that we can not export to compete with other nations. The answer is that we are exporting to an English colony right from the United States. It perhaps may be interesting to know some of the articles we export, and therefore I name some of them. We export nearly $300,000 worth of agricultural implements; of books and maps, over $100,000 worth; of breadstuffs, $118,000 worth; of carriages, steam-cars, etc., $358,000 worth; of chemicals, drugs, dyes, and medicines, $334,000; clocks and watches, $127,000; fish, $378,000; fruit, $110,000; iron, steel, and the manufactures thereof, $1,532,000; leather manufactures, $251,000; beer, nearly half a million; and the manufactures of wool, $1,440,596; sewing-machines, brooms, brushes, lamps;

The amount of exports during the last eighteen years amounting to $115,251,913, or near $115,252,000; balance of exports over imports amounting to $70,000,000 in round numbers and yearly increasing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BIGGS. I hope the gentleman may have more time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield more time to the gentleman from California?

Mr. PETERS. I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. FELTON. These figures illustrate two facts: First, that the advantages of this trade is not for the benefit of the people I represent, but for the country generally. As much as I have their interests at heart, and as proud as I am of the State I represent, as every other gentleman should be of his State, it illustrates the fact that this commerce is made up mainly of your manufactures east of the Rocky Mountains.

It also illustrates the fact that, according to the great fundamental principles underlying all trade and commerce, it is not always the cheapest, it is not always the nastiest that people prefer. It illustrates further that the question of commerce is the question of educating a people to its wants, its tastes, and its necessities.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. I understood him to say it is proposed to give this Australian line more than they asked. If gentlemen have paid attention to what I have said they will discover that the gentleman from Georgia was mistaken in his assertion. Unless something further is done the present service will not be maintained, but will take its place in the Victoria, British Columbia, line, to Australia, which is subsidized by the Canadian Government. Our people require aid to continue this line.

Mr. PETERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, I was an earnest supporter of the Senate amendment which proposed to give $800,000 for the ocean mail lines; but now I shall support the amendment that is under consideration.

The Central and South American Governments have few ships of their own. Wanting goods they buy of vessels that bring them to their doors, and thus naturally the trade of these countries is controlled almost entirely by those nations which have the largest merchant marine. The control of commerce is in the hands of the nations who control the means of commerce. What are the means of commerce? They are mail facilities, ships, banking-houses, commission-houses, and agents. There must be steamers to convey mail and merchandise with speed and regularity; there must be all the varied exchange, credit, draft, and the large lines of accommodation afforded by banks; and then commission-houses must be established where each line of goods, as it is landed by the vessels, finds reception; then agents must travel the country, after the manner of our drummers, and the goods they sell by sample must be delivered with regularity and certainty.

So it comes to pass that the people who seek important commerce with foreign people must have ships, mails, banks of exchange, commission-houses, and agents. Having the means of commerce, they can control commerce. Wherever the English ship goes laden with the manufactures of Great Britain, she finds at the end of her journey an English commission-house ready to take her goods and dispose of them among the people of that country. It is by all of these means that she controls trade.

Of what avail is the generally favorable sentiment of South America for us if we have not the appliances to furnish them goods? Our mails to them are far between and always irregular. We have but ten steamers going to the entire southern continent, when we should have more than that sailing from our ports every week. We have nothing like regular commission-houses and agencies, and as to banking, all our exchange is through English houses. When England, or France, or Germany contract to establish ocean mail to a foreign port it is for a term of years, and it is well known that it will be permanently continued. Thereupon her pushing business men open houses at these ports and exhibit their wares. If they need supplies from home they are received with promptness. A local commission agent from Brazil visited this country and among other things took back a large number of harvesting machines. They were received with great favor, and sold so readily that he at once ordered three hundred more. They took the usual course of American shipping to that country and were received seven months after the order. It is proper to infer that the harvesting season was over when they got there.

If we will make a five-year contract to carry our mail to these southern ports our merchants will flock to Rio, Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, and the great cities of that country, and open commission-houses. The restless agent for American goods will push his way to every trading-post and store in all that land. When the wholesale buyer wants an article the commission-house does not have, the drummer will reply: "We will order it for you from America, and have it here inside of thirty days."

Their merchants will open trade with ours because they will know we have come to stay. I know it requires time to get all these appliances at work, and that we can not in a year reach full control of this trade. Yet the first year will, beyond all doubt, yield gratifying results. When the word gets out among these people that the great Republic has recognized them and ask for the fellowship of barter, which next to the kin of citizenship makes a united people, the American ship will be the welcome guests in their harbors.

England has made of herself the workshop of the world, and by sailing her own ships, and maintaining rapid mail communication with all the nations of the earth she is enabled to control commerce to a larger extent than any other nation. She buys less and sells more than any other government. She buys nothing but raw goods; she sells nothing but manufactured goods. She sells to every one of the south countries more than she buys; in some instances six times as much as she buys. Last year she bought $5,000,000 worth of products from the Argentine Republic, and sold that country $30,000,000 worth. Not so with us; we buy from these countries more than we sell, and the triangular ship system helps to keep us in this rut.

English lines of vessels loaded at Liverpool for Brazil discharge their cargo there, and loading with coffee and other goods sail up to New York, discharge their load and sail across to Liverpool. They take a cargo to Brazil, and having no order for a return load home, and as we have no ships there, they take on board the order for a load of goods to America. And this is how we sell to Brazil only $8,000,000 worth a year, and our imports from her amount to $50,000,000. We ought to get rid of British triangular ships.

For carrying the mails from Port Townsend, to Neah Bay, 102 miles, we pay $6,303; yet from San Francisco to Mexico, a distance of 1,520 miles, we pay $208. Does any man believe the latter to be a just compensation?

For carrying the mail from Tampa to Key West, a distance of 249 miles, we pay $23,600. These are American ports; but from Key West to Cuba, a distance of 100 miles, we pay $237, the latter being a foreign island and called foreign mail. Do you approve of this as prudent business management when we seek the trade of that island?

We pay the New Zealand line $20,000 for carrying our mail to Australia, when we have an American line making exactly the same trip, and the New Zealand line is already paid $150,000 by its own government. Their purpose is to secure the trade of Australia and break down our line, which is seeking to secure that trade for America. Is this acting in good faith with American interests?

When we pay $280,000 for carrying our mail in foreign vessels and $46,000 to our own vessels, is that prudent management?

When for carrying commerce from and to our shores we pay to foreign vessels $136,000,000 per year and but $14,000,000 to American vessels, is that the statesmanship that builds a powerful government?

When in 1858 we were masters of the ocean, and in 1888 find ourselves without a vessel crossing the Atlantic with our mail, is it not loyalty to plead for the restoration of our commerce?

South of us lie fifty million people, their country bursting with natural wealth, an empire richer than India, from which Augustus Cæsar brought back $40,000,000 in excess of values exchanged, or of that field of commerce where Solomon sent one voyage which returned him gold valued at $14,500,000. These people are inactive and without genius. They import $500,000,000 worth of manufactured products annually—$450,000,000 from Europe and $50,000,000 from the United States. They have asked to be recognized in commerce by the great Republic, for they want to believe that their destiny moves with ours. We view the steamers from England, Germany, and France, loaded to the water's edge, bearing to their ports, into many of which the American flag has never entered, and unloading that merchandise whose sale and profit alone makes the vessel's native country tolerable to live in. We gaze upon this continent of measureless wealth that lies at our very door, and are surrounded at home by fields untended, by furnaces unfired, by a million men unemployed, by woman's face made white by anxiety and want, and are, like Tantalus, "doomed to parch with thirst in the midst of waves, and viewing banquets, to starve to death."

Mr. PETERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the condition of our merchant marine should awaken our earnest attention. The latest printed report from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation shows that on the 30th day of June, 1887, our merchant marine, registered, enrolled, and licensed, consisted of 17,570 wooden sailing vessels, with a tonnage of 2,553,706.46, 12 iron sailing vessels, with a tonnage of 9,331.54, 4,982 wooden steam-vessels, with a tonnage of 1,076,960.14, and 499 iron steam-vessels, with a tonnage of 465,756.70, a total aggregate of 23,063 vessels and an aggregate tonnage of 4,105,844.84. This tonnage is greater than that of any other nation except Great Britain. This tonnage is divided into two classes, coastwise and sea-going. In the coastwise is included all vessels plying upon our rivers, the lakes, and along the coast, from one port to another of the United States. In the sea-going is to be included all vessels plying between our own and foreign ports.

The coastwise trade is exclusively in our own hands. By law no foreign vessel is allowed to clear from one port to another within the United States. This coastwise trade has therefore as its only competition the railroads, which now reach from almost every sea and lake port and river point to the centers of trade and commerce. This competition by rail has become very sharp, and is rapidly driving to the dock to rot the "river palace" of the Mississippi and the trim coaster of the Atlantic seaboard. But this is competition arising among ourselves; as already remarked, no foreign vessel can enter into it.

To be exact, our tonnage is divided in occupation as follows: Coastwise trade, 3,010,735 tons; in the foreign trade, 989,412; and in the fisheries, 105, 98 tons. Our tonnage engaged in the foreign trade is lower to-day than it has been at any time since 1846, when it amounted to 943,307 tons, and almost as low as it was in 1810, when it was 981,-019 tons, and only about 40 per cent. of what it was in 1861, when it had risen to 2,496,894 tons. The tonnage in the coastwise trade has varied somewhat, but it is practically the same as it was in 1860 and 1861.

But we wish to speak more especially as to the foreign trade. The figures given above show the condition of our merchant marine engaged in that trade. But about 14 per cent. of the merchandise which enters and leaves our ports from or to foreign ports is carried in vessels flying the American flag. This is the condition. What has caused and is causing this? June 30, 1861, we had a tonnage of 2,496,894 engaged in the foreign trade. June 30, 1866, this had fallen to 1,387,756 tons, nearly one-half. These figures tell their own story. It takes no commentary traced in the smoke of burning merchantmen, the victims of rebel cruisers, to emphasize their meaning. Our merchants, not willing to risk the dangers resulting from the foreign cupidity which built these cruisers and the malignity, disregarding all the rules of modern warfare, which manned them, sold their vessels either to the Government or to foreign nations. During the war about 600,000 tons were sold to the Government and 801,301 tons were sold to foreigners, a diminution, aside from the vessels captured and burnt, of over 1,400,000 tons.

During these years the same enemy of the American ship which, under the lead of Jefferson Davis, succeeded in destroying the Collins Line, which succeeded in incorporating in the Confederate constitution a prohibition of any bounty, and which now opposes fair and decent pay to our steam-ships for carrying the mail, got in its fine and effective work. When the war was closed the American people sought to rebuild first the waste and desolation of war upon the land; and then, too, we had a great West and Northwest to open up to civilization and settlement. Railroads were to be laid, mines to be opened, lands to be broken up and made to yield their golden harvests. The bronzed navigator, taken from his ship to the land, left his warlike pursuits not to again contend with ocean's tempests, but to become a pioneer in subduing the wilderness and causing it to bloom and blossom like the rose.

Another cause of this decline in our foreign shipping is one not so well known to the American people, because there has been a studied effort to deny or at least to conceal the facts. We have had to contend upon the high seas with the shipping of nations aided from the treasuries of those nations. Sometimes this aid has taken the form of a bounty on building, as with France; sometimes the shape of a bounty upon distance sailed, as with France, Italy, and Spain; sometimes the shape of a direct payment of cash from the treasury of a gross sum per year, as was formerly the case with England; and sometimes the shape of additional mail pay, as is now the case with Great Britain. But whatever shape it has taken it has always been in fact a payment of cash in some form to their shipping from the public treasury. Up to 1885 England had paid in one way or another $273,563,000. In 1885 she paid $3,870,000 ostensibly as mail pay, while the United States paid $24,404. The contracts entered into by France with her lines (which expired recently—July, 1888) call for an annual payment of 23,388,892 francs. I am not certain that these contracts have been renewed, but possibly her bounty paid on distance sailed takes their place. Our Government pays to its merchant marine upon the high seas almost $30,000 for mail pay. I desire to read from a letter received some time since from a gentleman well acquainted with the facts:

"THE FIELD IS THE WORLD."—OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

We have no transportation to the River Plate countries; our mails to the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, and Uruguay, a large portion are sent via Europe, 3,000 miles out of their course, and the balance via Brazil. With Brazil we have one steam-ship line that makes only fifteen trips annually. Fully half of the mails to Brazil are sent via Europe; the reason of it is that our Government has been and still seems to be wholly unconscious of the great and growing importance of cultivating closer commercial relations with South America. It only needs a few cursory statements to show that we are throwing away golden opportunities of supplying large and important markets with manufactured goods that can be furnished by us to better advantage than can be done by European countries, if we only had mail facilities and the transportation that necessarily accompanies good mail service.

Brazil has an area nearly equal to the United States; her imports and exports amount to about $200,000,000 annually, of which about $90,000,000 are exports. The United States takes about $50,000,000 (principally coffee, rubber, and cocoa); she imports from the United States only about $6,000,000, consisting principally of flour, lard, petroleum, and some manufactured goods. Europe furnished her about $100,000,000 of merchandise, a very large item being manufactures of cotton (manufactured in Europe largely from cotton raised in the United States).

Some will naturally ask, why is this so? and the answer is, simply because of the lack of mail facilities and transportation; because the rulers of England, France, Germany, and Italy have seen the value of the trade and have paid liberally for mail service. Good mail service always brings in its train regular, direct, quick, and cheap transportation. The Argentine Republic has a temperate climate and is the United States of South America, and is growing in population and wealth pro rata faster than even our own wonderful country. Buenos Ayres, the principal seaport, has a population of about 450,000.

The freight carried on the Uruguay, Parana, and Paraguay Rivers is fully 4,000,000 tons annually. Over six thousand steamers and fifteen thousand sailing vessels enter the port every year.

As an illustration of the interest felt by that country in the United States, upon the news of the death of President Lincoln, as a mark of respect the Argentine Congress adjourned for three days and the legislature of the province of Buenos Ayres established a new county on the frontier bearing his name.

General J. A. King, director of the Argentine bureau of free information for the United States, says:

"We have copied your Constitution and many of your laws; our dollars are the equivalent of yours; our people are prosperous and progressive; our government is firmly established, and all our ways are peace. We want closer commercial relations, and for this purpose our government established a free information bureau in the United States of North America; for this purpose our government offered $100,000 gold annually, to establish direct mail service to our country. One of our large banking firms, Samuel B. Hale & Co., is composed of pure and unadulterated Yankees, energetic men of the highest character. Some of your Vermont men are shipping merino sheep to our country; some other Vermont men are building a railroad there; horses and cattle are being shipped from this country, some of them via Europe. Our foreign commerce amounts to $200,000,000 annually, of which the United States gets but about $11,000,000."

These countries want to be friendly; they want to trade with us, and we treat them with indifference. The most our Government offers for mail service is about $4,000 a year. Uruguay, as poor as she is, offers $25,000 a year to an American steam-ship company for mail service. It is simply a shame and a disgrace the way we treat our South American neighbors. There would be no steam-ship line to Brazil if Brazil did not pay the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company 190,000 milreis annually (about $85,000).

Brazil buys of us about 600,000 barrels of flour, 4,000,000 pounds of lard, and about 6,000,000 gallons of mineral oil every year. Our trade with that country might be quadrupled. We should have a mail going to and coming from Brazil every week. We should have a semi-monthly line of steamers running to the Argentine Republic and Uruguay. We could have this if our Government would pay a tithe of the amount that European countries pay to their steam-ship lines. Why should we not pay "what the service is worth?" The great West does not realize the importance (to them) of cultivating this trade. If it goes on increasing its raw products and its manufacturing interests, vast as its market now is it will yet see the necessity of opening up a wider market than it now enjoys.

Under the stimulus thus given to foreign ship-building the supply of vessels for the world's carrying trade has increased far beyond the demand. To-day, as I gather from a recent bulletin of the Agricultural Department, a ton (2,240 pounds) of flour in sacks is carried from New York to Liverpool for $1.30, and a barrel of pork for 24 cents. Over one thousand steamers came into the port of New York last year in ballast, i. e., unloaded. Foreign capital is content with 2 per cent. return; ours is not, and as long as one acre remains to be improved, one mile of railroad to be built, or one mine to be opened, our capital will prefer to seek such sources of employment.

It is only the prospect of trade at the end of the trip which will tempt it to compete with such odds as I have indicated. My judgment is that, so far as we can properly do it, we should send our mail to countries ready to trade with us, in vessels of American build, and at a compensation commensurate with the service rendered. We have not done this heretofore. For a long time we compelled our vessels to carry our mails at our own price, irrespective of the value to us or the cost to them of such service. We have long paid our own vessels a rate far lower than we have paid the vessels of other nations for exactly similar service. We have discriminated against our own vessels long enough, and I welcome the evidence of a coming desire to do this justice to them. I would not pay the heavy bounties paid by England and France. Those nations must soon, from sheer inability to continue, cease to do that, but I would give decent pay for honest service to these pioneers of American trade and American enterprise.

Mr. PETERS. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY was recognized, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. NELSON.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I had not any purpose in the first instance to say anything at all upon this question; but while listening to this debate thoughts came into my mind of what great navigators my ancestors had been, and what great navigators their descendants still are, and of the means by which they have been able to cope upon the sea with all the nations of the earth. That little country, indented with deep fiords, surrounded by rocks, icebergs, and the ocean, with less than two millions of people, has a merchant marine next to that of the United States of America, and is now, as she has been for a thousand years, one of the most successful nations in the world upon the ocean. And yet, sir, to-day gentlemen talk here about this great United States of America, with more than sixty millions of people, being unable to have a merchant marine or to maintain their place in commerce on the sea without the aid of subsidies.

I want to read to these gentlemen some statistics, and in passing I want to say that, as in the tariff debate it was the fashion upon one side to ascribe all the prosperity of the country to the tariff laws, so in this debate it is the fashion to ascribe every weakness, every defect in our shipping or in our trade and commerce to the rebellion which occurred in this country more than twenty-five years ago. When that rebellion took place I was a boy at school, and I was as ready as any body else to take up my musket and fight for the flag of this country and defend it against the rebels of the South. But to-day when we are discussing an economic question, that matter of the rebellion is brought up again, and gentlemen gravely tell us that American ocean shipping does not exist because we had a rebellion twenty-five years ago. To me this seems all stuff and nonsense, all fuss and feathers. [Applause.] The trouble is, gentlemen, you have put the American merchant marine in a sort of strait-jacket. Do you know that during the rebellion, when the rebel cruisers were sweeping your vessels from the ocean, hundreds of them were purchased by that little country of Norway and used in her commerce, although she had as good and ample material for ship-building and as good ship-carpenters as you had?

Mr. STRUBLE. Why did they buy them?

Mr. NELSON. Because they were cheap and because they had a right to buy them—a right which an American citizen has not under your laws to-day.

Mr. STRUBLE. But what was the inducement to buy them?

Mr. NELSON. They bought them because they could buy them cheaper under those peculiar circumstances than they could make them at home [applause], and because they had the privilege of buying them; while in this country you say by your laws to people who are willing to put their capital into the enterprise of traversing and trading in ships on the high seas that they can not buy a vessel unless they buy it at the price which it costs when made in this country.

Now, as I have said, Norway is a little country and a poor country, and I cite it not because I was born there, but because, and if gentlemen examine the statistics they will find, that it is one of the most poorly endowed countries on God's green earth; and yet that poor little country, with free trade and free ships, comes next to the United States of America in its shipping and tonnage. I want to read the figures to the House, and I want you gentlemen who prate about the depredations of the rebel cruisers twenty-five years ago, and about the necessity for subsidies to-day, to take these figures to heart and study them. I read from the last American Almanac, which I suppose you all consider good authority. First on the list comes Great Britain, with 7,089 vessels, having a tonnage of 6,127,375.

Next (and these figures have reference not to your coastwise trade, but to your foreign commerce alone) comes the United States with 6,639 vessels and a tonnage of 2,684,067. And next to the United States comes poor, little, poverty-stricken Norway, with less than two millions of population, but with 4,352 vessels, having a tonnage of 1,585,193 tons. How is that for a country with only 1,900,000 people, as compared with a great country like the United States with all its wealth, capital, and resources?

But the following table of arrivals and clearances in all the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, by nations, for the years 1885, 1886, and eleven months of the year 1887 show more fully and clearly the great difference and disproportion between the merchant marine of Norway and the ocean merchant marine of this country, and shows what a sorry figure we cut in trans-Atlantic commerce.

Total entries and clearances by nationalities of all vessels with cargoes at the ports of the United Kingdom from and to foreign countries and the British possessions during eleven months ending November, 30, 1887, compared with 1886 and 1885.

Now, as to this proposed subsidy, would this little subsidy build up American commerce? Certainly not. It would simply help these particular lines, and they would lie back on their oars, with this bonus in their pockets, and freeze out every other line that attempted to compete with them.

You will be simply putting into the hands of these favored steam-ship lines a subsidy weapon by which they can bid defiance to any other line which might seek to engage in the commerce in which they were plying. To obviate this result you would have to give a bonus, in order to build up trade at any given point, to every ship plying to that point; because if you should give a subsidy or bonus to one line to the exclusion of all others, you would enable that line to freeze out all other American lines; and they would do it, because steam-ship lines are as selfish as railroad corporations or any other body of selfish men that you can imagine.

Mr. Speaker, in order to show that the view I have expressed is not the opinion of a "blasted foreigner," I desire to have read by the Clerk an article from the pen of Professor Arthur Hadley, of Yale College, the author of a work on railroad transportation, which is, in my opinion, the very best work on that subject. The article which I send to the desk is a calm, dispassionate statement of the result of our experience in the past in reference to this matter of subsidy. It gives the view of a man who does not write from a party standpoint, but from the standpoint of common sense.

Mr. FELTON. It is from a free-trade standpoint, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

I ask the Clerk to read the article I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

STEAM-SHIP SUBSIDIES AS A MEANS OF REDUCING THE SURPLUS.

[By Professor Arthur T. Hadley, of Yale College.]

The United States has in two instances tried the policy of steam-ship subsidies on a large scale—with the Collins line in 1850-'58, and with the Pacific Mail in 1865-'75. In neither case was the result satisfactory.

The subsidy to the Collins line was in large measure due to the efforts of Mr. King, of Georgia, for some time chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs. As early as 1841, only two years after the first contract of the English Government with Samuel Cunard, he urged the United States to follow the example of England. The first act of Congress on the subject was passed in 1845; the amounts devoted to the payment of steam-ship lines were gradually increased until 1852, when they amounted to nearly $2,000,000 annually. At the close of that year there were American steam-ship lines running from New York to Liverpool, Havre, and Bremen; also from various American ports to the West Indies and the Isthmus of Panama, with connections thence to Oregon.

Much the most important of these enterprises was the Collins line, which made fortnightly trips from New York to Liverpool, for which it received a subsidy of $858,000. The history of this line is an instructive one, because it shows clearly the dangers of the subsidy system, even under the most favorable circumstances. The boats were designed, built, and managed by thoroughly competent men. They were the finest specimens of steam-ship construction then existing; they were probably the best sea-going wooden steam-ships which have ever been built. They were much more comfortable and much faster than the English boats with which they came into competition, and though the Cunard line was forced by the influence of their American rivals to build newer and better boats than they had before, they were far from equaling the Collins line in speed or comfort. Nor was the American line dishonestly managed. Mr. Collins was largely influenced by patriotic motives. So far from making any money out of his connection with this enterprise, it ultimately caused his financial ruin.

But the fact that there was no intentional dishonesty makes the absence of good economy all the more apparent. The managers believed that they had the public Treasury to fall back upon. They indulged in all sorts of expenditures, necessary and unnecessary. Changes were made while the vessels were in process of construction which greatly increased their cost, in many cases without corresponding advantage. The capital stock was insufficient. The company was heavily in debt from the first. The care in management, which was the only thing that could have enabled them to carry this load of debt, was altogether wanting. If any one desired an illustration of the danger of paralyzing individual thrift by Government aid, he could hardly find a better one than the early history of the Collins line. Under such circumstances the apparent prosperity of the business could not last long. The rage for making fast passages rather than safe ones occasioned the loss of two steamers; a change of feeling in Congress caused the subsidy to be withdrawn, and the company was found to have nothing left to stand on.

The Pacific Mail had a much longer life, but its history was in many respects worse than that of the Collins line. It was less harmed by the discontinuance of the earlier subsidies in 1858 than by the renewal of the policy in 1865. The $500,000 a year which was paid them for their China service by the contract of 1865 proved but a poor compensation for the unsound methods which were introduced into the management—in part, apparently, as the result of that contract. Up to 1865 the Pacific Mail had been a sound concern. Its shares stood above par. After that it fell into the hands of speculators; it lost nine vessels in as many years; its shares dropped below forty. An additional subsidy of another half million was voted in 1872. But the company was unable to get the new vessels ready for service within the time stipulated; and while the Government was hesitating what to do a series of disclosures showed that the contract of 1872 had been obtained by wholesale corruption. Public opinion was strongly aroused against the system. The contracts of 1865 were allowed to expire and were not renewed. It was felt that the trade which had been encouraged had not been that of merchants in China, but of speculators and lobbyists at home.

Such facts as these furnish a strong argument against the attempt to build up an American steam marine by means of subsidies. But there are special circumstances which render the lesson doubly important at the present time.

In the first place, the difficulties of building up an American carrying trade in this manner to-day are exceptionally great. The cost of ships in America is greater than it is elsewhere. No foreign-built ship is allowed to carry the American flag. Our ship-owners are thus compelled to buy in a dear market, and then compete on even terms with those whose plant is cheaper. But this is not all. Even if we were allowed, by a change in the navigation laws, to buy our ships wherever we pleased, we should not be on an equality with our competitors in this matter. In order that American capital may be attracted into the foreign carrying trade, it is necessary that the rate of interest obtainable in that business should be about as high as that which can be had in other lines of business which offer chances for investment. That is not the case at the present time. Shipping profits have been cut down by large investments of European capital, artificially stimulated by subsidies. They have been so much cut down that there has been for two or three years practically no money to be made in the business.

If the current rate of interest in France on business ventures of a certain class is 5 per cent., and in America 7 per cent., America can not compete with France on equal terms in that business, unless she has a special advantage in the conduct of the business equal to 2 per cent. on the invested capital. Forty years ago we had such an advantage, on account of our superior facilities for building ships and superior skill in sailing them. To-day both of those advantages have been neutralized. Iron has been substituted for wood, steam for sail. Nothing short of a subsidy equal to the difference in current rates of profit in the two countries would put us on an equality in this matter; and that would only do it in case France gave no subsidies at all. But France does give subsidies, on a very large scale; so large as to have stimulated an overproduction of French ships, which has done the French nation more harm than good. To accomplish anything effective we should have to counterbalance the difference in the rate of profit and the French subsidies put together. Were this done, we should doubtless have a great many foreign steamship lines of our own; but they would be running for the subsidy rather than for the trade.

There is a tradition that "trade follows the flag;" that where our ships run we shall develop a trade. This may have been true before the invention of the telegraph, when the cargo was so often a matter of private enterprise on the part of the ship-owner. But there can be no doubt that it is every day less and less true, and it is probably furthest from the truth on those lines of communication where subsidized steam-ships would be likely to run. The notion that such lines would act as drummers for New York houses has very little basis in fact.

If under this condition of things we are asked to grant steam-ship subsidies as a patriotic way of getting rid of the surplus, the presumption is strongly against the wisdom of any such policy. In all the affairs of life, whether public or private, it is a dangerous thing to spend money simply because you have it. It is almost certain that such money will be unwisely spent. This is conspicuously true of government expenditures. The really wise ones have not been made where an overflowing public treasury was used to help individual enterprise, but where some specific need was felt, and the government set about to have that need met in the most efficient way.

England has at times given large steam-ship subsidies, but she has done it on business principles. It was a political necessity for her to have communication with her colonies, and to have steam-ships which could furnish her with a naval reserve, and a transport service in case of war. In order to do this she had to pay for it. She tried to pay as little as she could for the service rendered; but she could not, without political suicide, dispense with such service. She had the same reasons for subsidizing steam-ships that we have for maintaining postal communication on lines which do not pay. It was the same reason which has led Germany and Russia to build military railroads, or which led us to grant liberal aid to the Union Pacific in 1862 and 1864. In all these cases it was a matter of business for the Government to secure its end. The fact that the returns could not all be measured in dollars and cents did not prevent its being sound business policy. In fact, it furnished a strong reason why the government might properly make the expenditure, because there was an advantage to be gained, of which individual enterprise could not reap the benefit.

But where subsides have been given, as has been recently the case in France, or as was done in America in the instances already described, as a means of encouraging private commercial enterprise, it has not proved good business policy. It has caused waste instead of economy, loss rather than gain; it has not proved a source of naval strength or commercial prosperity for the nation which has adopted it. It has turned out to be simply an inducement to extravagance.

It is undoubtedly desirable to reduce the Treasury surplus; but why? Just because it offers a temptation to extravagant uses of money. To make the existence of such a surplus a justification for subsidies is simply to court the evil of which we are afraid. If we spend our money recklessly, we shall not have so much left to spend, and in that way the immediate danger may be diminished; but meantime we shall have done the very harm which we wished to avoid. More than this, we shall have laid the foundation for future evil of the same sort; for any such lavish expenditure of money conceals the need of wise measures to prevent its accumulation.

The existence of a surplus creates a presumption that if subsidies are granted at all they will be granted unwisely. If the surplus is made an avowed reason for granting them, this presumption becomes overwhelming. If the policy should be adopted under the influence of such arguments, we must be prepared to see it at its worst.

ARTHUR T. HADLEY.

Mr. NELSON (before the reading of the foregoing was concluded) said: Mr. Speaker, without consuming further time in the reading of that article, I will incorporate the whole of it in my remarks. I am sorry that I have not time to go into this subject further. In conclusion I wish only to say, recurring to the subject of a comparison with the merchant marine of Norway, that this little country has free ships. A citizen of that country can buy ships in Norway or the United States or anywhere else under the sun. And as for subsidies, Norway is so utterly poor that she could not think of subsidizing a single vessel for a single year. If she should undertake to enter upon a policy of subsidies she would be swamped forever. Hence in that country you have a case where the people are poor because of the natural poverty of the country, where they have practically free trade, where they have all the materials for ship-building and are first-class ship-builders, and yet are allowed to buy ships all over the world; where, in short, the people are left untrammeled just as God made them and are at liberty to compete with all other people on the face of the globe. You can scarcely go into any harbor of the civilized world without finding a Norwegian ship. Now, the idea that in this country, with all our wealth, with all our resources, with all our material, we can not create or keep a merchant marine afloat without giving subsidies to a few steam-ship lines which ply from California westward or to some of the South American countries is preposterous. As I said a moment ago, the giving of bounties to a few steam-ship lines will simply arm them with weapons to keep everybody else out of the business.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me one inquiry?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can not England buy her ships everywhere?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can not France? Can not Germany?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, I think so.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yet have not each one of those nations in the past been forced to aid her shipping interests in this way, by bounty, subvention, or some other system of generous support?

Mr. NELSON. I will answer the gentleman if I have time. In regard to France, she has attempted a large scheme of subsidy and is now feeling the effects of it; she has been caught on the receding wave, and as a result her shipping interest is now more sickly and dilapidated than it ever was before—the result, if you please, of overprotection and overproduction. [Applause.]

In regard to England, her subsidies have not been granted for protective purposes at all, but simply with a view of keeping up communication by her merchant marine with her outlying provinces and colonies.

Mr. BINGHAM. That does not answer the question I asked.

Mr. NELSON. I have the privilege, as the gentleman must understand, of answering his question in my own way.

Mr. BINGHAM. You have not answered my general proposition.

Mr. NELSON. Well, I can not help it that you do not seem to understand and appreciate my answer.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, that is no argument; there is nothing at all in it. I have made the general inquiry whether the history of those great nations, though their people may have the right to purchase their ships wherever they please, does not show that in each case the nation has by subsidy, subvention, or bonus aided in the development of the shipping interests.

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. They have attempted it temporarily, and as a result——

Mr. BINGHAM. Why, England is giving four millions in that way to-day.

Mr. NELSON. The aggregate result in all countries outside of England is that they are to-day feeling the evil effects of overproduction and oversubvention in that industry; and as regards England, it is not a matter of trade with her, but a question of taking care of her interests by maintaining communication with her extended outlying provinces and colonies.

Mr. BINGHAM. England knows nothing but trade.

Mr. NELSON. It is a pity that we do not have something of that spirit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FELTON. Will my courteous friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] allow me one word?

Mr. NELSON. I will, for I wish to be courteous.

Mr. FELTON. I infer from what the gentleman has said that Norway is a poor country, that her people are driven to the sea as a dernier ressort. They have there, as I understand the gentleman, absolute free trade; they were poor before and they are poorer now. Thank God! I am a citizen of a country that does have to seek for, and will avoid as long as possible, the cheap and the nasty; and I hope that the people the gentleman is speaking of may also arrive at that point or condition. The commonest natural requirements of citizens of the United States would be luxuries to people in some countries——

Mr. NELSON. Now let me answer your question.

Mr. FELTON. Let me get through. I only hope the gentleman's own country will arrive at the same kind of civilization in time as pervades ours.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, I know all about the feeling in California. You have been hating the Chinese so long over there that you hate everything else in the shape of a foreigner.

Mr. FELTON. So far as our feelings for the Chinese is concerned, the gentleman states it exactly. You are right there. I feel complimented.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, you hate the Chinese——

Mr. FELTON. You could not pay me a higher compliment than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NELSON. And you have got so over there that you can not discriminate in your dislike between Chinese and foreigners from any other countries, even those who are not in favor of the "cheap and nasty." The gentleman had a good deal to say about that. I notice, however, that the great manufacturing establishments and the great corporations of the gentleman's part of the country and elsewhere wanted the cheap and the nasty in the shape of contract labor, and we had to pass laws to prevent them from coming in. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. FELTON. I am as much opposed as the gentleman to anything of that kind; but it took a statute of Congress to pass it. I did all I could to that end.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It was a Republican law we repealed, I believe.

Mr. NELSON. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. FELTON. I am with the gentleman from Minnesota in this sentiment, and I want him to understand that I, myself, introduced in this and in the Forty-ninth Congress, early in the sessions, a bill in this House to prevent objectionable immigration, which your committee have not dared to report. Why did your committee not report the measure and give the representatives of the people an opportunity to act on it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind the gentleman that the gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. It must have been a center shot, from the confusion that the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota seemed to create on the other side.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I can have order for a few moments——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend his remarks until the House comes to order.

The gentleman from Missouri has forty minutes.

[Mr. DOCKERY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman believe that free trade could remedy it?

Mr. PETERS. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not claim to have a very intimate knowledge of the working of the foreign mail service of our Post-Office Department. I shall not try to discuss it. What I shall try to do in the time I have at my disposal is to show the great benefit which will flow to that part of the country in which I live if the Senate amendment becomes law and means what I believe it to mean, and is executed by the Postmaster-General as he says he will execute it, according to the spirit of the act.

I do not understand the Senate amendment in the way in which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] understands it. He looks upon it as a subsidy pure and simple, using the word in the odious sense of a mere gratuity to a few existing lines of steamers. He even declared that under it a large sum of money would go to the Pacific Mail Company. How he reaches that conclusion I can not possibly see. I have not time to argue the question at length, but I will state what my understanding of its meaning is. If this amendment were to become law and were to be faithfully executed by the Postmaster-General, he would not be compelled to pay a single solitary dollar to the Pacific Mail Company.

Of course I speak of the moral obligation resting on the Postmaster-General. As to legal enforcible obligation, there is none. He could not be impeached if he refused to spend a dollar. But I repeat, that if he endeavored, as he says he would, to carry out the spirit of the act, he would not be compelled to spend a single solitary dollar on any existing line for the existing service of that line. All the money which he would have to spend, all the contracts which he would in honor be bound to enter into, would be either to secure direct mail facilities where such facilities do not now exist at all, or else to secure a better service from an existing line than he can otherwise secure. Indeed I am inclined to think that he would be derelict in his duty if he spent a single dollar of this money to an existing line as an additional compensation for the same amount of service which would be rendered without the additional payment. The meaning of the Senate amendment is simply this. Compensation to existing lines for ordinary service is elsewhere provided for.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the existing law.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, in the existing law, and the appropriation for it is found at the bottom of page 5 of the printed bill. Here it is: "For transportation of foreign mails, $547,000."

Now, just as we find in the transportation of our mails by rail that the ordinary mode and rate of compensation will suffice for ordinary cases, while in exceptional cases an exceptional rate of compensation is proper, and we therefore appropriate for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, as we do in this very bill now pending; just so the Senate amendment provides for an extra or special compensation for the transportation of our foreign mails by sea in those cases where the ordinary modes of compensation do not afford the mail facilities which the people of this country ought to have.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I must say that I prefer the Senate amendment. Why? Because I can not see how, under the gentleman's amendment, we could secure direct steam communication where we need it most. I mean between New York and New Orleans in the United States, and Buenos Ayres and Montevideo in South America. The main effect of the gentleman's amendment would seem to be to give a more adequate compensation to existing lines of American steamers. That may be perfectly proper. But what we need most of all, I think, is to secure direct steam communication where there is no existing line at all. How can you start a line of American steamers between New Orleans and Buenos Ayres, or between New York and Buenos Ayres by merely giving four times the sea and inland postage? It is impossible. In such a case you must give a mileage rate, and you can not give it except under the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will it trouble my colleague if I ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Not if it is a brief one. My time is limited.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Have you investigated the subject far enough to know whether the appropriations will be sufficient to establish new lines at the place indicated by you.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not know that. I only know that if the money is not sufficient for that purpose it will not be spent for that purpose. I know further, that the new lines could not be started under the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Understanding the Senate amendment as I do I believe in the wisdom of adopting it. It is an exceptional means of securing an exceptional advantage. The general principle of bounty or subsidy is not involved at all. I believe our trade with Central and South America is capable of a great development. I believe this mainly because I believe in the magnificent future of the Argentine Republic. Increased trade with the West Indies and with the northern part of South America and with Brazil may be of great benefit to us. It does not compare with what we should gain by increased trade with the Argentine Republic. The foreign trade of that Republic is great already. It is nothing compared with what it will be in ten years.

We need that trade to-day. We shall need it tenfold more in ten years. We can secure it if we make a determined effort now. In ten years it may be beyond our reach.

I might almost say, Mr. Speaker, that I have a local interest in this question. I have been looking at some tables of imports into the Argentine Republic. I am surprised to find how many of the more important articles are produced in my own Congressional district, or in the immediate neighborhood of the city of Chicago, in which I live. If other gentlemen will examine the subject in the same way, I believe many of them would see the practical bearing of it in the same light.

What I want to see done for the benefit of the Northwest is the establishment of frequent and regular steam communication between New Orleans and Buenos Ayres. It would benefit not merely the Northwest, but the Southern States of the Mississippi Valley. Of course there should be a similar line from New York, but we in the Mississippi Valley are mainly interested in the New Orleans route.

There is another trade facility which I hope to see established, and which would have an important bearing on our trade with Central and South America. I mean an all-water route from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. Such an all-water route, by its cheaper water carriage or by the effect of its competition on railway rates, would cheapen the cost of transportation to Central and South America from nearly all the manufacturing towns along our Northern border.

But what we want first of all and most of all is a frequent and regular line of American steamers from New Orleans to Buenos Ayres and intermediate points.

Suppose we get such a line by adopting the policy indicated by the Senate amendment now pending. What would the effect be on the industries of this country and particularly upon the industries of the Mississippi Valley, North and South?

First consider what sort of a customer for American goods the Argentine Republic is likely to be. It is the strongest, the richest, the most progressive among the younger nations of the world. Labor is comparatively scarce there, and wages are high. The people of the Argentine Republic earn money easily and spend it freely. They are in that respect like the people of the United States. The market which they offer us is likely to become within twenty years the best market in the world for us outside of the United States.

I hold in my hand a very attractive book, just published, entitled "The Capitals of Spanish America," by Mr. W. E. Curtis. Mr. Curtis was secretary and acting commissioner of the commission appointed under the act of July 7, 1884, to ascertain and report on the best modes of securing more intimate international and commercial relations between the United States and Central and South America.

Undoubtedly the information in regard to Spanish America contained in this book is also to be found somewhere in the two bulky volumes of the report of the commission. But Mr. Curtis has in this book shown the happy faculty of imparting useful information in a very entertaining way. The main facts are here put into a more convenient form. Besides, what I want to show is not merely the dry facts of the imports of foreign goods into the Argentine Republic; I want to show the spirit of that people, their way of living, their way of making and spending money as it is now, and as it is likely to be in the future.

It is these traits of national character and habits of earning and spending money which makes all the difference in the world between a good customer and a bad customer for American products, and particularly for American manufactured goods. Where a population is poor, where wages are low and the people find it hard to make both ends meet, you will not find a good market for manufactured goods unless it be for the inferior grades of goods at a low price.

On the contrary, when the laboring population of a country have good wages, and not only make both ends meet, but have something to spend for the luxuries of life, there you find a good market for the better grades of goods, even at the higher price.

Mr. FELTON. Is not that true of Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly it is. It is true of all new countries of great natural resources, where the people are intelligent and enterprising, and where labor is scarce and wages are high. I was just going to say that, and I was going to say further that this difference between the cheaper goods at the cheaper price and the better goods at the better price is just the difference between British and American goods.

Take cotton goods, for example. If the people of the Argentine Republic were poor, like many of the customers of Great Britain our solid, honest and durable cotton goods could not perhaps compete with the cheaper Manchester cottons, which are sometimes hardly more than mosquito netting filled up with pipe clay. As the people of that great republic of South America actually are, we could compete in their markets against Great Britain with our better cotton goods, even at the better price which we should have to charge for them. The proof is that British cotton goods are often imported into South American markets under a fraudulent Massachusetts trade-mark.

Now, let me read some extracts from Mr. Curtis's book:

Here is something on page 543 about Buenos Ayres:

The city of Buenos Ayres is the only one of the South American capitals in which modern ideas and manners of life prevail. The town is of mushroom growth, like Chicago. There were no old prejudices to uproot, no antiquated bigotry to tear down. It looks less like Spain and more like a modern American community.

Again, on page 549:

Notwithstanding the commercial disadvantages of Buenos Ayres—

That refers to its inferior harbor facilities, which I understand have been remedied since the book was written—it is the most enterprising, prosperous, and wealthy city in South America, a regular Chicago, the only place on the whole continent where people seem to be in a hurry, and where everybody you meet seems to be trying to overtake the man ahead of him. It is all bustle and life night and day, and is so different from the rest of South America that the traveler is more impressed than he would be if he came direct from the United States.

Our knowledge of the Argentine Republic amounts to little more than we know of the Congo State, and the man who goes there from the United States is kept in a state of astonishment until he leaves. Then as he sits on shipboard and reflects over what he has seen he can not find an exclamation point big enough to do justice to his description of the country. The Argentinians think it is wicked indifference on our part to know so little about them, for the surprise of the few American visitors wounds their self-esteem. They are a proud people like the rest of the Spanish race, and unlike some nations have many things to be proud of. They know all about us.

There are many men in the Argentine Republic who can tell you the percentage of increase in population, industry, and progress in the United States as shown by the latest statistics. But how many people in the United States are aware that that country is growing twice as fast as ours? How many members of the Senate or the House of Representatives at Washington, how many members of the Cabinet or justices of the Supreme Court know that the increase of population in the Argentine Republic during the last twenty-five years has been 154 per cent., while in the United States it has been only 79 per cent., and that Buenos Ayres is growing as fast as Denver or Minneapolis?

The people are right when they assert that their country is the United States of South America and there is nothing else that they are so proud of. They study and imitate our institutions and our methods, and in some cases improve upon them. You can buy the New York dailies and illustrated papers at any of the news stands in Buenos Ayres, although they are six weeks old, and the people purchase and read them. They understand the significance of the cartoons in Puck, and read Harper's Magazine and the Century. Blaine's book and Grant's memoirs are on sale, and the issues of our Presidential campaigns are as well understood as their own local squabbles.

Here is what he says about steam-ship lines on pages 551, 552:

Twenty-three lines of steamers connect the Argentine Republic with the markets of Europe and from forty to sixty vessels are sailing back and forth each month. In the harbor of Buenos Ayres, or in what they call the harbor, are dozens of steam-ships and scores of sailing vessels showing every flag but that of the United States, for an American steamer never goes there, and only occasionally a bark or brigantine chartered at New York or Philadelphia with a cargo of lumber or railway supplies.

Nearly all the goods these people buy of us are sent by way of Europe, as mails and passengers usually go, and very little is bought in the United States that can be purchased elsewhere. The reason for this is very plain—we have no transportation facilities; while those afforded for trade in Europe are as regular and convenient as exist between Liverpool and New York.

And this trade is worth having. The Argentine Republic imports nearly $100,000,000 worth of merchandise every year, of which about one-third is from England, one-fifth from France, one-fifth from Germany, while the United States comes in at the tail of the list along with Sweden, Denmark, and Chili. While England sent $35,375,628 worth there in 1885 we sent $7,000,000, mostly lumber, railway supplies and cars, and agricultural implements. While she sent $7,000,000 worth of cotton goods, we sent $600,000 worth. While she sent nearly $7,000,000 worth of hardware and other manufactures of iron and steel, we sent about $500,000 worth, and so on down through the list of manufactured articles in which we with equal transportation facilities can compete with any nation on the globe. Our goods are more popular there, as everywhere in South America, so popular that the manufacturers of Manchester and Birmingham imitate our trade-marks and send cargoes of merchandise which appear to have been produced in the United States, but never got nearer Yankee-land than Liverpool.

This, then, is what the people of the Argentine Republic are to-day. What are they likely to become within ten years? They appreciate now the difference between British and American goods. What are they likely to do when they can get our solid, honest, and durable American goods by direct frequent and regular steam communication with New York and New Orleans? We can drive the British goods out of the market. Four years ago I had a conversation with a gentleman at Chicago, who had for years been engaged in selling American goods by sample in some of the South American cities. He told me that on one occasion he was trying to sell agricultural machines such as are made in my Congressional district. There was a demand for a considerable number of them. The superiority of the American machine at the price demanded was admitted. Yet he could not sell his machines. Why? Because they could not be delivered in time. Why not? Because there was no direct and regular steam communication with the United States. The machines would have to be sent to Europe and thence to South America. So his customer, or rather the man whom he wanted for a customer, decided to get the European machine, although he admitted its inferiority to the American machine at the price demanded. He could get the European machine more promptly and regularly when he needed it.

This one example, as it seems to me, illustrates the whole case.

It can not be denied that the Argentine Republic already offers a very valuable market for foreign goods, and that our share of their foreign trade is an insignificant one. I have in my hand an address, delivered May 8, 1888, by Edward Augustus Hopkins, a citizen of the United States, though long resident at Buenos Ayres, before the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, on the Argentine Republic and coterminous countries.

This address contains a table showing the imports for the year 1886. This list covers a large number of articles produced in the United States. It will not be claimed, of course, that in all of the articles shown by this list we can successfully compete with Europe in the markets of the Argentine Republic. Some of them cost much more to produce in this country than in Europe.

There are many, however, in which we can compete, even where the question of competition is a question of price without regard to quality. There are many others in which we can hold the market by reason of the superiority of the goods, even at a higher price than Europe can lay them down for. It is rather significant to notice the number of articles in the list I have referred to, which were imported from the United States, although in small amounts, during the year 1886.

They are starch, dried fish, meats, preserved vegetables, flour, hams, dried fruits, dried vegetables, preserved fish, cheese, tea, ale or beer, spirits, tobacco, cotton cloth, cassimeres, twine threads, canvas, lampwick, tanned goods, woolen manufactures, articles of hemp, calicoes, ready-made clothing, oils, colors, gunpowder, mahogany, trunks and boxes, pianos, paper, boots and shoes, saddlery, harness, tanned hides, arms and equipments, nails, cutlery, tools, thrashing-machines, sewing-machines, railroad materials, watches and clocks, glassware, lamps and coal.

I have said that many of the articles imported into the Argentine Republic are manufactured in the immediate neighborhood of the city where I live. Here is a partial list of them: Meats, preserved vegetables, flour, hams, dried fruits, cheese, beer, spirits, cotton cloth, tanned goods, ready-made clothing, trunks and boxes, boots and shoes, saddlery, harness, nails, tools, agricultural implements, sewing-machines, watches, glass, and railway supplies.

This list, with the exception of watches which are made in the Congressional district of my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS], adjoining that which I have the honor to represent, is taken from the annual statement of the trade and manufactures of Chicago given in the Chicago Tribune of January 1, 1888. It appears that in the industries represented in this list about 46,000 workingmen were employed last year in and about the city of Chicago, and a capital of over $41,000,000.

If gentlemen would only look at the subject from this practical point of view they might be surprised to find how much their own districts are interested in it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART], in front of me, is interested in the new cotton-cloth industry of his own State. He would be interested to know how much cotton cloth the Argentine Republic imported last year. If there were a line of steamers from New Orleans to Buenos Ayres the cheap, strong, serviceable cotton fabrics of Georgia, which now, I understand, begin to compete with Manchester cottons in China and the East Indies, would compete with them also in the South American market. Then there is the lumber industry of Arkansas and Louisiana, and a dozen others, which I have not time to mention.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will hardly do to intimate, as the Postmaster-General seems to do in his letter to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, that it is useless or unwise to try to extend our foreign trade while we maintain a protective tariff. The protective tariff secures the home market for our manufactured goods. It does not follow that we ought not to export our manufactured goods whenever we can do so at a profit.

Here is the fact. We did export to the Argentine Republic during the year 1886 a large variety of American goods. These goods were sent largely by way of Europe. If we could have sent them direct, the amount and number of them would have been greater than it was, even though many of them were produced in this country only by reason of the existence of a protective tariff.

Those, at least, who have been urging us for the last three months to abandon the protective system, in order, as they say, to secure the markets of the world, ought to be the first and foremost in the support of a provision which will be needed, if they have their way, in order to enable us to adjust ourselves more rapidly to the new condition of things upon which they would have us enter.

Nor will it do to say that the foreign commerce of the Argentine Republic is too small to deserve our attention. If it is not worth having for what it is to-day, it is at least worth having for what it is surely destined to become. Remember, too, that although the Republic is certain to become a large user of manufactured goods, it is not likely to become a manufacturing nation. It has neither fuel nor water-power.

Nor can it be said that the people of the Argentine Republic do not desire to have closer commercial relations with us. They desire it eagerly. I understand that they have offered to give $100,000 per annum for the establishment of a direct line of steamers to the United States if the Government of the United States would give an equal sum, and that the offer is still standing.

This reminds me of the remark of the gentleman from Georgia that a direct line of steamers to New York was likely to be established between the Argentine Republic and New York without the interposition of our own Government. I think he is mistaken. The line he referred to is the Houston line. As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has said, it is a British line. Its headquarters are at Liverpool. It was offered the bonus and accepted it; but when it was ascertained that the company was required to build new ships of 4,000 tons burden and adapted to carry two hundred and fifty passengers, the company threw up the project, and we are as far off from having direct steam communication between the United States and Buenos Ayres as we were before.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the establishment of frequent and regular steam communication between New York and New Orleans, in the United States, and the capital of the Argentine Republic and intermediate points, which, as I understand the matter, would be the logical outcome of the adoption of the Senate amendment and its faithful execution by an intelligent and patriotic Postmaster-General, would return to the people of the United States tenfold all the money it would cost the Treasury of the United States.

Is this proposition disputed? Not at all. Those who oppose the Senate amendment will not stay to argue the question of the commercial advantages involved in it. They put their opposition on other grounds. They say that it is subsidy pure and simple, by which they mean a gratuity to a few favored lines of steamers. Mr. Speaker, if a subsidy in the odious sense in which the word is used shall come out of the pending proposition, it will arise, not out of the act itself, but out of the execution of the act by the Postmaster-General. He can make it a subsidy or not, as he pleases. I admit that we give him the power. I have no fear that he will abuse it.

He tells us in his letter to the chairman of the committee that if this Senate amendment becomes a law he will faithfully execute it according to the spirit of the act. The spirit of the act is that he shall make contracts with new or existing lines of American steamers, not for their benefit, but for our benefit. The terms of the contracts which he is to make are entirely within his discretion, except that they shall not extend less than five nor more than ten years, and that the rate shall be a mileage rate and shall not exceed $1 a mile.

I believe the Postmaster-General to be an intelligent and patriotic man. I believe he will exercise the power we give him, not in the interests of a few individuals, but in the interest of the people of the United States. His aim will be

To provide more efficient mail service between the United States and Central and South America and the West Indies.

That is the very language of the act. If out of this improved mail service there shall come, as I believe there will come, a large and profitable increase in our Central and South American trade, our mails to and from these countries will also increase, and the cost of carrying them then reckoned by the pound or price of mail matter will largely diminish. The experiment may fail. So may any experiment fail. We voted $100,000 the other day for further experiments in the making of sorghum sugar. That experiment may fail, but it was well worth trying.

The incidental advantages to our merchant marine and to our political and commercial relations with the countries of Central and South America, which we hope for as a result of an improved mail service to those countries, may after all not be realized. If so, we shall at least have gained something. We shall have set at rest a long-disputed matter. If we can not in this way extend our trade relations with the countries of Central and South America then we can not in this way extend our trade relations with any countries in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the experiment will not fail. I believe it will be a great and enduring success. I believe it will draw closer the ties of international and commercial friendship between the United States and the countries of Central and Southern America. I believe it will lead to a great and profitable extension of our foreign trade. I believe it affords the safest and wisest way in which we can take the first step toward the restoration of the American merchant marine.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had directed him to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3215) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Cummings Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4423) relating to certain acts of the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons of the District of Columbia and defining their duties, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5064) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, La.; and

A bill (S. 2563) to compensate Mrs. Sarah L. Larimer for important services rendered the military authorities in 1864 at Deer Creek Station, Wyo.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 7749) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Wabasha, Minn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that it had passed joint resolution (H. Res. 161) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue arms and equipments to the militia of the District of Columbia.

It further announced that the Senate had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 431) granting a pension to Emma S. Free, widow of Thomas S. Free, late major in the United States Army, and agreed to the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAND. I desire in the interest of the overworked officers of this House to make a request for unanimous consent——

Mr. PETERS. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to make a motion for a recess until 8 o'clock, if the gentleman will yield, as it now only wants about seven minutes of 5 o'clock, and we will have to take a recess at that time under the previous order of the House for the consideration of pension bills. It is hardly worth while for the gentleman to begin to make a speech now in the short time remaining; and I will therefore move a recess until 8 o'clock. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to hear what he has got to say.

Mr. BLAND. I stated, Mr. Speaker, that in the interest of the officers who are overworked in this House, I wished to make a request for unanimous consent to the effect that the night sessions ordered by the House be limited to half past 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The night session for to-night is limited by the order to half past 10.

Mr. BLAND. But that all evening sessions fixed heretofore by the House be limited to half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. PETERS. I think that order had better not be made with reference to to-night, at all events, until the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is present.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It does not affect the order for pensions, as that is already limited.

Mr. PETERS. Then I have no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Human nature requires some rest; human endurance has its limits, and the officers of this House ought to have a little consideration by the members. They have been entirely overworked; they are necessarily here all the time; the sessions of the House have been very long and very trying; and I understand there will be no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair hear objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the evening sessions heretofore ordered by the House be limited to half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. LYMAN. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask how much time of the six hours is remaining for the general debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of the amendment have occupied two hours and twenty-four minutes. Those opposed to it have occupied two hours and twenty-two minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that, as soon as the six hours shall have been exhausted, by agreement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania we will ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hour and fourteen minutes of the general debate remains.

Mr. FELTON. Will the question be then open for further amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. That will depend on whether the previous question is ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to make a suggestion to the House, which, I believe, will meet the approval of a great many of the members present, if not all. We have had several night sessions lately, in addition to the long daily sessions, and the House corps of reporters are overworked and very much exhausted. These gentlemen have been working night and day all week, and in the interest of common humanity, and in behalf of the officials of this House, I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. Before that, I want consent to renew my request, and hope there will be no objection to so reasonable a proposition. We had a meeting last night, we have one to-night, and we have one fixed for to-morrow night. It is not right to require men to do such an unreasonable amount of work.

Mr. BINGHAM. But we did nothing last night.

Mr. BLAND. That is not the fault of the officers of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true; and the Reporters were present, and had to do their work whether anything resulted or not.

I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PERKINS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!"

The motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew my motion for a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would that interfere with the order providing that this session shall be for the consideration of pension bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not. The Chair understands that by a special order of the House the evening sessions of Friday are set apart for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I wish to ask if the pension cases which were set for last evening can be taken up this evening?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that these cases have returned to their proper places on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole, and would be in order at the Friday evening sessions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; that is a mistake. They are not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are in the House and not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was misinformed. The Chair understands that they are still in the House. It would be in order to-night to call them up before the House goes into Committee of the Whole or after the committee shall have risen.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of Senate bill 1009, and that it be now considered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 1009) granting an increase of pension to Sallie R. Alexander, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sallie R. Alexander, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month, for and during her natural life, in lieu of the pension of $30 per month now paid to her.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1009) granting an increase of pension to Sallie R. Alexander, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army, have had the same under consideration and concur in the Senate amendment, which is as follows: Strike out in lines 7 and 8 the words "one hundred" and substitute therefor the word "fifty."

Your committee beg leave to submit the following statement of the military service of Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army, husband of claimant:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, February 14, 1888.

"Statement of the military service of Thomas L. Alexander, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office:

C., from May 16, 1858, to March 8, 1864. He was retired from active service October 16, 1863, for disability, resulting from sickness and exposure in the line of duty. On duty under orders of the commanding officer of Louisville, Ky., from March 9, 1864, to August 16, 1866; member of the examining board of applicants for promotion in the Army to December 31, 1867; unemployed to June 20, 1868; on court-martial duty in the Department of the Cumberland to January 22, 1869; unemployed to March 11, 1881, upon which date he died at Louisville, Ky.

"THEO. SCHWAN,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

General S. B. Buckner, who is now governor of Kentucky, was an Army associate of Col. Thomas L. Alexander, and renders the following tribute to the memory of the deceased, which is made part of this report:

"COL. THOMAS LUDWELL ALEXANDER.

"The announcement of the death of this accomplished gentleman and distinguished soldier has filled with sorrow a large circle of friends. His genial qualities, his exemplary life, his Christian virtues endeared him to all with whom he was associated, and left upon all with whom he came in contact the impress of his generous nature. But though he has departed from this life he has left behind him the rich legacy of an example worthy of our imitation and a character calculated to excite our emulation and to command our esteem. His career has been an eventful one.

"Born in Prince William County, Virginia, of an illustrious parentage, he ranked amongst his ancestors the distinguished statesman, Richard Henry Lee, who was his great-grandfather; and emigrating to Kentucky at an early age, he entered the United States Military Academy in July, 1826. On graduating from that institution in 1830 he entered the Sixth Regiment of United States Infantry as brevet second lieutenant, and was successively promoted to the grades of second lieutenant, first lieutenant in 1837, and captain in 1838 in the same regiment, in which he continued to serve until promoted to the grade of major of the Eighth Infantry in 1853, and subsequently to the grade of lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Infantry in 1861.

"The earlier years of his military career were passed in what was then our extreme western frontier, in Missouri and Iowa, and his military qualities soon attracted the attention of his superiors. After only two years of active service he was selected by Brigadier-General Atkinson as aid-de-camp, and participated with that distinguished soldier in the battle of the Bad Ax, August 2, 1832, against the Sac and Fox Indians, who were under the leadership of the celebrated chief, Black Hawk, and after this decisive victory was selected by the commanding general to conduct the captive chief to Washington City.

"After the conquest of these Western Indian tribes and his promotion to the grade of captain, he was ordered with his regiment against the Seminole Indians in Florida, and actively participated in the arduous campaigns against that tribe during the years 1839, 1840, 1841, and 1842. On the conclusion of the war, the difficult character of which can only be appreciated by those who have experienced like hardships and privations, he was selected to superintend the removal of the present Indian nation west of Arkansas of the Seminole Chief Tiger Tail and his band; and was subsequently stationed in their midst at Fort Towson, to hold them in subjection. In this remote region, which was then so far beyond the limits of civilization, he remained until the outbreak of the war with Mexico and the concentration of the troops of the regular Army by General Scott for the first campaign against the City of Mexico. From the Lower Rio Grande he moved with his company, which was the color company of his regiment, to the rendezvous near Vera Cruz. The landing was effected by Worth's division on March 9, 1847.

"This descent, which was made in the close view of an enemy superior in numbers, was no ordinary pageant. Three thousand veteran troops embarked in boats, each of which was manned by seamen and directed by an officer of the Navy, moved in a line parallel with the shore, and in perhaps less than three minutes from the landing of the first boat the entire line of three thousand men had formed upon the bank and were moving upon the heights beyond. Alexander's colors were the first displayed upon the beach, and it may be safely asserted that he was the first soldier of that veteran army whose feet touched this hostile shore.

"In the siege of Vera Cruz which followed, and which terminated in its surrender on the 29th of March; in the battle of Cerro Gordo on the 17th and 18th of April following; in the subsequent pursuit of the retreating enemy through Jalapa Perote and the city of Puebla; in the terrible day of Churubusco, and the operations resulting in the final capture of the city of Mexico and the dispersion of the armies of Santa Anna, Captain Alexander bore an active and a distinguished part, in recognition of which he received the rank of brevet major, August 20, 1847, 'for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco.'

"That veteran army which planted its victorious standards on the national palace of Mexico and won an empire for its country contained many a knightly soldier, but it could boast of no truer gentleman or more chivalrous spirit than Thomas Ludwell Alexander.

"At the close of the war with Mexico he was again assigned to duty on the frontier in Kansas and Minnesota, until selected to organize the Military Asylum at Harrodsburgh, Ky., in 1854, where he remained until appointed, in 1858, lieutenant-governor of the soldiers' home, near Washington City, in which position he continued until March 8, 1864.

"The arduous duties of a military career, extending over a period of more than thirty years, and the deleterious influence of the varied climates to which he had been exposed, seriously injured a constitution which was never robust. He was compelled, therefore, after so many years of devotion to his country, to avail himself of the privileges accorded by its laws, and on October 16, 1863, was 'retired from active service for disability resulting from long and faithful service, and from sickness and exposure contracted in the line of duty.'

"The remaining years of his life were passed chiefly at his beautiful home near Louisville, Ky., cheered by the presence and the affection of the cherished partner of his life, the devotion of his children, the admiration and love of numerous friends, and the sincere regard and esteem of the community of which he was an ornament.

"In the fullness of years, at the age of seventy-three, he sank peacefully to rest on the 11th of March, 1881, the laurel wreath of the chivalrous soldier encircling his honored brow, and the confiding trust of Christian hope cheering and inspiring his heart.

"Among the numerous friends who lament the loss of this accomplished gentleman none can more deeply grieve than the writer of this brief sketch of his military career. His subordinate for many years, and honored by his friendship, he early learned at the bivouac and around the camp-fire to appreciate the noble qualities of his commander, which attracted the love and commanded the esteem of all who approached him. His imposing presence, his kindly, loving nature, his generous impulses, his true dignity of character, his stainless honor and integrity, his knightly and chivalrous bearing, united to make 'a combination and a form, indeed, which give the world assurance of a man.'

"LOUISVILLE, March 14, 1881."

In view of the distinguished services rendered the country by the deceased, and the advanced age of claimant, your committee find that the case appeals strongly to the generosity of Congress, and therefore make this favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that we pursue the same course that we pursued last Friday evening, that only those bills be acted upon that are specially called up by members present.

Mr. SAWYER. I object.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggest that in addition to the request made by the gentleman from Michigan that those who were on the list last Friday evening and did not get recognition be the first recognized to-night. Perhaps with that modification the gentleman from New York will be satisfied.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That is understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that some fifteen or twenty gentlemen were left over from the list last Friday evening, and an objection will cut those gentlemen out. Is the objection insisted upon?

Mr. HOUK. It will be.

Mr. SAWYER. If I may be permitted to make a statement, I will say that I did not object because I have any personal interest in the matter. There is not a case on the Calendar in which I have any personal interest at all. But there are Senate bills which were referred to me and which I have reported. There is nobody here to look after those cases. I have heard a great deal of complaint in regard to the Senate delaying action on bills that have passed the House. If the cases are not taken up in regular order on the Calendar the bills that have passed the Senate and come to the House will be put over to suit the personal feelings or desires of independent members of the House, and we will have the Senate complaining of us as we complained of the Senate at the last session. It is getting toward the latter part of the session, and I think we should follow the regular order. That is the reason I object.

Mr. PERKINS. I will suggest to the members present that on last Friday evening there were a number of gentlemen upon the list who were not recognized when we adjourned. It was then agreed (although I do not, of course, say that binds the House to-night) that the gentlemen who were not recognized should be recognized this evening, and all have depended upon that. I think it is but fair that the gentlemen omitted then should be recognized. After they are recognized, if it be the wish of the gentleman from New York, we can proceed in the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HOUK. I object. I was on the list during the early part of the session and never was reached. I did not insist on being recognized afterwards. I have been here several nights when I could not get recognition. I was not here on the night to which the gentleman refers. I was out of the city last Friday night and could not be here. I do not see why the proposed action should be taken just because it is more convenient for gentlemen to come here on one night than another.

Mr. PERKINS. That is hardly a good reason for objecting to recognition of those who were here.

Mr. FINLEY. I have been absent since the 16th of May, and have had no recognition. I do not think gentlemen who have unfortunately been absent from these sessions should attempt now to take advantage of those who have attended here regularly. I think they should abide by the action of the House on last Friday evening. The Chairman then announced, and I thought properly, that he would carry the list over to this evening, and would recognize those who failed of recognition at the last pension session for want of time; and I trust that members who were not here and could have been here last Friday evening will not attempt now to take advantage of those who were here. I have never sought to take advantage of my occasional absence to ask any extra privileges, and I do not think it ought to be done by any one.

Mr. GALLINGER. As we are wasting valuable time, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to say that my name was on the list and went over. I have only had one bill passed in six months and do not think it is fair to be cut off by the objection of gentlemen who have been absent from the House half the time this session. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will permit the Chair to make a statement, the Chair will say that at the meeting before the last unanimous consent was given to every member to call up a bill. At that time the Chair was able to recognize every gentleman present.

Mr. HOUK. We will all agree to that to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be the fault of the Chair if every gentleman is not recognized.

Mr. HOUK. If it is understood every gentleman will be recognized, I will withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated at the last meeting that unless members interfered and objection was made, he would carry over the list and recognize members to-night. The Chair is endeavoring to carry out the agreement.

Mr. MCCREARY. I have not asked permission to make a remark for a month. I have a bill which I would like to call up to-night. But I think fair play requires that those gentlemen who were present last Friday night and whose names were not reached should be recognized in regular order to-night. I ask that the Chair proceed with the call of the names in regular order, so that those who staid here last Friday night and were not called may now have an opportunity of calling up their bills. I make that motion, although it cuts me out, as I think it is fair and just.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] asks unanimous consent that gentlemen on the list who were not recognized to call up bills at last Friday evening's session be now recognized in their order. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the first bill.

C. R. THOMAS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 335) granting an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas.

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky. I ask the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas, whose pension certificate is numbered 120171.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 335, having considered the same, report it back and recommend its passage with the following amendment, to wit: Add, after the words "one hundred and seventy-one," the words "and pay him a pension of $12 per month."

Your committee hereby adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 135, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

Charles R. Thomas, late a corporal of Company D, Sixty-fourth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, was in receipt of a pension of $2 a month from March 18, 1872, to August 23, 1882; of $4 a month from August 23, 1882, to September 6, 1882, and has been in receipt of $6 a month from the last-mentioned date to the present. The history of the disability of the claimant is given in an affidavit of Darius Landon, who deposes:

"That he was a member of Company D, Sixty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; that he was personally acquainted with the applicant, Charles R. Thomas, and believes him to have been a sound, healthy man at the date of his enlistment and until the 15th day of June, 1862, on which date, at Battle Creek, Alabama, the said applicant received injuries in the following manner: He, the said Thomas, with others, was detailed by the colonel commanding to procure water. It being very dark the said applicant fell into a deep intrenchment, thereby injuring himself to such an extent that he was unable to help himself, and that the affiant, with others, assisted him out and carried him to camp, and that he was not afterwards with the command. The affiant also says that he has been acquainted with the applicant since his discharge from the Army, and verily believes that the disability existing in the said applicant is the effect of the injury received as before stated, and that it, the said injury, incapacitates him for the performance of manual labor."

The technical character of the disability is shown in the following extract from an affidavit of Dr. George H. Masters, dated September 24, 1887, who swears:

"That he has often examined this applicant, Charles R. Thomas, and finds him a continual sufferer from chronic myatitis, located near the lumbar regions, and in addition to this he finds a partial anchylosis of both ankle joints, which disabilities incapacitate him and render him unfit for the performance of manual labor."

Dr. Masters is corroborated by other medical testimony; and the sound health of the applicant before entering the service, the receipt of the injury detailed, and the resulting and continuous incapacity of the applicant are proven by several affidavits from men who were his comrades and remain his neighbors. The applicant is now sixty-six years old; his pension is his support; and the committee recommend the passage of the bill for its increase.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the titles of the bills be read in their order, and that if consideration of any bill is not asked when its title is read it be passed over, according to the usual custom.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HANNAH H. LATHAM.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (H. R. 8506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Hannah H. Latham, dependent mother of Bela E. Latham, late a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5781) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham, having considered the same, report as follows:

Claimant is the mother of Bela E. Latham, late a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Maine Volunteers, who died on the 23d day of July, 1864, while in the military service, and of disease contracted in said service. The mother was pensioned as a dependent, but in 1879 the name was dropped from the rolls, after a special examination, on the ground of non-dependence. A careful examination of the papers in the Pension Office and other papers filed with the committee make it reasonably clear that some of the important testimony taken by the examiner was prejudiced and unfair, the probability being that at no time after the son's death did the parents have property to an amount exceeding $500 after their debts were paid.

The evidence now shows that the parents are both nearly seventy years of age, in infirm health and destitute circumstances, thus bringing the claimant directly within the rule adopted by this committee and recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, to wit, present dependence.

As the present bill is defective in form, your committee report back a substitute, and recommend its passage, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and substitute these words:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Hannah H. Latham, dependent mother of Bela E. Latham, late a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Maine Volunteers."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA TREFREN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (H. R. 4098) granting a pension to Eliza Trefren.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Trefren, widow of James Trefren, deceased, late of Company G, Seventeenth Vermont United States Infantry.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4098) granting a pension to Eliza Trefren, having given the same consideration report as follows:

James Trefren was a private in Company F, Seventeenth Vermont United States Infantry, and was severely wounded in the thigh at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, the ball being removed by incision.

He was pensioned, and the pension was increased on account of increased disability from the wound, which seemed to affect the entire system. In 1866 the examining surgeon certified as follows:

"He is very lame and suffers great pain in the seat of the wound. The increased disability consists in increased lameness, but chiefly in broken-down health, the result of the wound and its effects."

It is in evidence that the soldier's health continued shattered, his nervous system suffering greatly. Epileptic seizures followed, and it is supposed that he died in an epileptic attack, although there is no medical testimony on this point, either pro or con. It is only known that he died suddenly, in what is said to have been a fit.

As epilepsy rarely ever manifests itself primarily in persons of mature age except as the result of nervous exhaustion, and as this soldier's wound had been for a long time undermining the nervous system, it is certainly reasonable to suppose that the epileptic condition was directly due to the injury received in battle. Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "deceased" in the sixth line, by substituting "F" for "G" in the seventh line, and by inserting the word "Vermont" after the word "Seventeenth" in the seventh line, and as amended recommend its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STEPHEN A. SEAVEY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. REED) was the bill (H. R. 7510) granting a pension to Stephen A. Seavey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Stephen A. Seavey, formerly of Company C, Twelfth Regiment Maine Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $30 a month from and after September 3, 1885.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7510) granting a pension to Stephen A. Seavey, having considered the same, report as follows:

Soldier enlisted November 11, 1861, and was discharged August 17, 1862, for epilepsy. He was pensioned June 23, 1880, at $8 per month, from date of discharge, which was increased to $24 January 17, 1883, and to $30 from March 3, 1883. On September 25, 1885, pension was suspended on the ground of unsoundness prior to enlistment.

A very careful examination of the papers in this case shows that it is very difficult to determine with anything like absolute certainty the real facts in the case. On the other hand, claimant alleges a sunstroke while in the service as the cause of his epilepsy, but fails to conclusively show the incurrence of said sunstroke. Could he do this, there would be no doubt as to the merit of the claim, and his restoration to the roll would be a matter of the simplest justice. On the other hand, the Department, after exhaustive special examinations, failed to prove that soldier had epilepsy prior to enlistment, the nearest approach to that being that he had severe sick headaches, which resulted in so-called "crazy spells" or "spasms." It is a well-known fact that if a person is a confirmed epileptic that circumstance is well known in the community, and it seems strange that in this case, if claimant was so afflicted, it can not be made to appear without question.

The papers on file indicate that there was a difference of opinion among the officers of the Department as to the merits of this case, and that doubt is also impressed upon your committee.

The bill asks that soldier be again placed on the rolls and be paid a pension of $30 a month from and after September 3, 1885, the date at which the pension was discontinued. Your committee are not clear that this should be done, and yet feel that there is a strong presumption that the equities of the case are with the soldier, and hence recommend that all after the word "month," in the seventh line, be stricken out, and that, as thus amended, the bill be passed.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALLIE T. WARD.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. FINLEY) was the bill (H. R. 8574) granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward, and pay her a pension of $50 per month during her natural life.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8574) granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of William T. Ward, have had the same under consideration, and find that a similar bill to the one before your committee was introduced into the Forty-sixth Congress and passed, but was not called up and acted on in the Senate.

As to the facts and history of this case, the report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions of that Congress is adopted as the report of this committee.

Said report shows that he was mustered into the service October 4, 1847, as major of the Fourth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and served with his regiment in Mexico to July, 1848, and was honorably mustered out with his regiment at Louisville, Ky., July 25, 1848.

He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers 18th September, 1861, and brevetted major-general of volunteers 24th February, 1865.

His services were: Organizing brigade in Kentucky from September 20 to December 1, 1861; commanding troops at Green River Bridge, Ky., to January 8, 1862; commanding Sixteenth Brigade, Department of the Ohio, to March 12, 1862; commanding camp of instruction at Bardstown, Ky., and all the troops on the lines south of Louisville, Ky., to July, 1862; commanding troops at Lexington, Ky., during part of July, 1862, and in pursuit of Morgan to August, 1862; commanding at Munfordsville, Ky., to September 5, 1862, and a brigade in Army of Ohio to November, 1862; commanding post and brigade at Gallatin, Tenn., to June, 1863; commanding Second Brigade, Third Division, Reserve Corps, Department of the Cumberland, to October, 1863, and brigade in the District of Nashville to January 8, 1864; commanding First Division, Eleventh Corps, to April, 1864, and First Brigade, Third Division, Twentieth Corps, to June 29, 1864; commanding Third Division, Twentieth Corps, to September 23, 1864; on leave of absence to October 10, 1864; commanding Third Division, Twentieth Corps, until corps was discontinued, June, 1865. Honorably mustered out of service August 24, 1865.

He distinguished himself in the battles before the fall of Atlanta, and in the fights preceding the surrender of General Joseph E. Johnston's army.

While leading his brigade in a charge at the battle of Resaca, Ga., he was severely wounded in the arm and side, but refused to leave the field. He was absent on leave only seventeen days during the whole war.

The fractured bone by the wound at Resaca gave him much trouble, and he finally found the arm useless. On account of his wounds he was receiving a brigadier's pension of $30 per month at the time of his death (certificate No. 109492).

He died October 12, 1878, a few months after completing his seventieth year of life.

While we can not say that his wounds and exposures in the service of his country were the direct cause of his death, they doubtless tended to diminish his powers to resist the effects of old age and to hasten his death.

He left a widow now past sixty years of age and without property or means of support.

Your committee find many precedents for the legislation asked in the accompanying bill passed at every Congress since the war. Among them we will only refer to the pensions of Elizabeth York, widow of Shubal York, surgeon Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteers (chapter 53, page 582, 14 Statutes at Large); Rose Webster, widow of Reason H. Webster, Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois (chapter 116, page 530, 20 Statutes at Large); Grace Aikins, widow of William R. Aikins, Company A, Eleventh Iowa Volunteers (chapter 286, page 575, 20 Statutes at Large); Caroline Webster, widow of Col. Fletcher Webster, $50 per month; and widow of General James Shields, $100 per month (chapter 46, page 3, first session Forty-sixth Congress).

Your committee recommend that the accompanying bill be passed.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NANCY BALDWIN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. HOVEY) was the bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Baldwin, widow of Reuben Baldwin, deceased, late of Company B, Fifty-eighth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Nancy Baldwin is the widow of Reuben Baldwin, deceased. She made application for pension as soldier's widow, and the same was rejected on the ground—

"That the disease of which the soldier died (typhoid fever) was not contracted in nor due to his military service, nor due to the hernia for which he was pensioned, said fever occurring six years after his discharge from the service."

The soldier was pensioned for inguinal hernia, which he contracted by falling through a bridge while on picket duty before Corinth, Miss., about May 6, 1862.

The examining surgeon, Dr. Hugh H. Patten, says:

"He finds hernia in left groin produced by a fall. The rupture is very large, and often very painful; it is several inches long. Soldier is unable to do any kind of labor; disability permanent, and in my opinion equivalent to an amputation."

Dr. J. A. Malone testifies that soldier came under his professional treatment (date not stated) suffering with inguinal hernia of right side.

"I thought there was ulceration in the bowels, for he sank down suddenly shortly after the hernia had made its appearance in the right side, and there was no time for a surgical operation, as death followed soon after, September 3, 1868."

In a later affidavit he testifies:

"The cause of his death, September 3, 1868, was from typhoid fever and the inguinal hernia, of which he sank suddenly before an operation could be had."

Two years later, August 19, 1879, Dr. Malone again testifies:

"That the prime cause of the soldier's death was inguinal hernia of the right side, causing perforation of the bowels. Typhoid fever was secondary to the above trouble. The inflammation of the hernia was made very active by the fever during the last two or three days of his sickness and he sank down and died on or about the 3d of September, 1868."

Dr. West testifies that soldier never had but one hernia that he knows of, the one of which he died.

All the evidence tends to show, in the opinion of the committee, that the death of the soldier may reasonably be traced to the hernia contracted in the Army. True he might have died of typhoid fever had hernia not existed, but the medical testimony shows that death must have been produced by hernia and typhoid fever combined.

While there may be a doubt as to the actual cause of death, the committee are disposed to give the widow the benefit of the doubt, and therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCCREARY). The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the Chair declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 6.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Mr. HOVEY. In order not to delay the business of the evening I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, not losing its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. MARY M'GEE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut) was the bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McGee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary McGee, widow of Thomas McGee, late private Company I and Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McGee, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary McGee is the widow of Thomas McGee, who served as a private in Company B, Thirteenth Connecticut Volunteers, from January 4, 1862, to April 25, 1866. He was a pensioner for varicose veins and resulting ulceration of right leg, and died July 20, 1885, of valvular affection of the heart.

The widow's claim has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the evidence fails to show that the death cause was due to the service.

Dr. Harmon Shore, who attended the soldier for fifteen years before and up to his death, testifies that—

"The soldier had varicose veins on both legs; those of the right leg most extensive, with large painful ulcers over the front and inside of the leg; for which he was under treatment every year more or less during the last fifteen years, up to the time of his death. He also had a defect of his circulation, a feeble action of the heart; and several years previous to his death physical examination of the chest indicated valvular changes and disease of the heart. The immediate cause of death was, in my opinion, from embolism, produced by the above-named diseases and defects of the circulation, and originated from causes developed while in the service of the Army and line of duty."

The soldier served more than four years, and a greater part of this time in the malarial sections of the Southwest, and, as shown by the record, suffered from the effects of malaria during service, although no application for pension on that account was filed by him. Medical examinations show that he was of good habits, and that he was a great sufferer from the diseased condition of his legs.

In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, your committee feel inclined to accept the attending physician's statement as correct; and the claimant's good character and need for assistance from the Government being vouched for by the best citizens of the town in which she resides, report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 3.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will designate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL] to act as tellers.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas can give any reason why this widow of a Union soldier should not be pensioned I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. He does not need to have a reason.

Mr. KILGORE. As gentlemen have asked for reasons, I suppose I have a right to give them.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know the number and title of this bill, because I want to preserve them with the record of the action here of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] for use in the campaign. I would not ask anything better.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has appointed as tellers the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL]. They will please take their places.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us have a call of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. Let us make this record.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman has asked for my reasons; I suppose I have a right to give them.

Mr. PERKINS. That is what I want.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Connecticut will take their places as tellers.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Connecticut will take their places as tellers.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, we are about to have a division. The gentleman from Texas said he would like to give his reasons. I for one would like to hear them, as perhaps that will save further trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent. If the gentleman from Texas desires to make a statement he can ask consent to do so.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. I called up this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. I wish to make a request that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I called the bill up at the request of my colleague, Judge GRANGER, who is detained at his home by sickness; but inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas has raised the point of "no quorum," I ask that the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I make this request at the suggestion——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. Debate is not in order. The tellers will take their places. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 2.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas insists on the point of "no quorum." The tellers will retain their places.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] to withhold that motion for one moment.

Mr. KILGORE. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being withdrawn, the ayes have it; and the bill is laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

LEVI LITTLE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. BUCHANAN) was the bill (H. R. 8794) granting a pension to Levi Little.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Levi Little, late of Company E, Fourth Regiment of Delaware Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

Levi Little served as private of Company E, Fourth Regiment Delaware Volunteers, from August 14, 1862, to June 3, 1865, when honorably discharged.

His claim for pension on account of disease of lungs has been rejected by the Pension Bureau, on the ground that there is no record of disease of lungs or heart, and no medical testimony showing the existence of either of those diseases prior to 1876.

Two comrades, who are shown to be credible, testify that the claimant contracted what they supposed to be disease of lungs near Fairfax Court House, Va., in January, 1865.

The records of the War Department show that he was treated at different times during his service for soreness, boneache, pain in stomach, cramps, pain in head, etc.

Dr. J. G. West testifies that claimant came under his treatment immediately after his return from service, and was treated more or less until 1872, when he left the neighborhood. Affiant found him in shattered constitution, much weakened and debilitated, which condition affiant attributed to claimant's army service.

Dr. T. A. Taylor testifies to treatment for lung troubles since 1876.

A number of lay witnesses, claimant's neighbors, testify to claimant's soundness at enlistment, and his debilitated condition at discharge and since.

Dr. Lewis Jemison, late United States examining surgeon, testifies that claimant was under his professional care for about two weeks in 1876. He was then in general broken-down condition, physically prostrated, and unable to do any manual labor.

The medical examinations fail to show any disease of lungs, but disclose hypertrophy of heart.

It is true that the medical evidence is not positive as to the character of the disease from which claimant suffered at discharge or thereafter. This, however, should not in any way prejudice the claim, as it is a well-known fact that without a very thorough examination it would be difficult even for a professional to make a correct diagnosis of the particular disease when located in the chest, and in its incipient stages. This difficulty is fully recognized in the practice of the Pension Bureau, under which it is held—

'That it is not supposed that claimants should be able to determine the exact nature of a disease located within the chest, whether it be of the lungs or heart, and that the allegation of lung disease should be held to be sufficient to cover any disease of heart which may be found to be due to the service."

This ruling was made in the case of a soldier who was discharged for disease of lungs, alleged said disease, but upon medical examination was found to suffer from disease of heart.

In the case under consideration there is a lack of record evidence of the existence of either disease in the service, hence its rejection by the Pension Bureau; but there is, in the opinion of your committee, sufficient and reliable testimony showing after nearly three years' service such a debilitated condition at discharge as should leave little doubt as to the connection between the now existing disease of chest and the service.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS HARRIS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (H. R. 5530) for the relief of Thomas Harris.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an adverse report.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask that it be informally passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take the vote of the committee on the question. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] moves that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY FOSTER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (H. R. 817) granting a pension to Mary Foster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Foster, mother of Ezra P. Foster, late a private of Company A, Eighth Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Claimant is the mother of Ezra P. Foster, late a private in Company A, Eighth Maine Volunteers. Soldier was killed in battle at Drewry's Bluff, Va., May 16, 1864. Soldier left a widow, who was pensioned, but whose pension has been discontinued in consequence of remarriage.

Claimant applies to Congress for pension as dependent mother. It is established that she was largely dependent upon the soldier for support, and that he sent her considerable sums of money while in the Army. She is seventy-nine years of age, in feeble health and destitute circumstances, and is indorsed by a large number of her neighbors, who have petitioned in her behalf as a woman in every way worthy.

Your committee report the bill back favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. FORREN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (H. R. 8677) granting a pension to Mary E. Forren.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Forren, widow of Morris Forren, late a private in Company I of the Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Morris Forren was a private in Company F, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteers. The evidence shows that at the battle of Petersburgh, Va., a shell hit some rails and a portion of a rail struck soldier in the chest, knocking him down. While lying on the ground he was hit by another piece of shell in the left leg, which produced a very severe wound to the bone. Soldier was pensioned at $8 per month, which was subsequently increased to $18, which pension was continued until his death, in September, 1875.

The widow made application for a pension, but the claim was rejected on the ground that soldier's death was due to pneumonia, and there was no proof to sustain the theory of the attending physician that there was either a metastatic abscess or blood-poisoning in consequence of the wound to the leg.

The two last medical examinations the soldier had show that the wound was open and discharging a great deal, pieces of bone frequently coming away. The surgeons also say that the wound was a bad-looking one, very painful, and that he was quite lame.

Further evidence in this case is as follows:

Mary L. Griffin, who nursed the soldier constantly during his last sickness, swears that he suffered very much with his leg; that the pain in the leg was sometimes so severe that he would grasp it and screech in his agony, saying that the pain was killing him. She also says that the leg was greatly withered, and that after he died it turned almost black.

Rufus Fickett, a man of integrity and standing in the community, testifies that he was intimately acquainted with the soldier, and saw him frequently during his last illness; that as long as he could speak he continually complained of distress in the wounded leg and same side of the body; that after he ceased to speak he would draw up the wounded leg, grasp it with his hands, and sometimes strike on it, and that after he died his leg turned almost black from his ankle to above the knee, there being a number of dark spots between the knee and hips.

Dr. George Googins, of Millbridge, Me., an examining surgeon of the Pension Department, attended soldier in his last sickness. Dr. Googins made several affidavits in the case, covering substantially the same ground, and all claiming that the soldier's death was the result of the wound. In one affidavit the physician says:

"I was called to examine soldier after his discharge from the Army in April, 1865. Found him suffering from a wound in the left leg, below the knee, caused by a shell carrying away a portion of the tibia. He also complained of pain in the left side, with soreness of same. Said he was injured in the side at the same time that he was struck by the shell in the leg. I made an external application to the side. The leg was very bad; bone came away from time to time, and it discharged a good deal. He received a pension for the wound to leg, but always complained of his side. He came to see me about two weeks before death, complaining of feeling badly. At this time the wound was discharging very little. Shortly after this I was called to see him; found him complaining of severe pain in side and leg, accompanied with cough and symptoms of pneumonia. The wound had stopped discharging, and shortly after he died. My opinion of the case was that the wound of leg and the hurt to the side were the cause of death."

Dr. Googins subsequently testified as follows:

"Soldier died from the effect of wound of leg received in service, and for which he was pensioned. I treated him for the wound frequently from the time of his discharge until his death. It was a bad sore and discharged very much at times, which discharge reduced him greatly in strength, and at last blood poisoning resulted, affecting the lungs and causing pneumonia. To sustain my theory I cite you to Erichsen's Surgery, page 46), fifth edition, on Metastatic Abscesses from Pyemia."

Dr. Googins further says—

"That when he visited soldier in his last sickness in addition to the symptoms already enumerated he found him with a quick pulse, hurried respiration, cold chills, wound tender, discharge suppressed, and leg swollen, and that he died with all the symptoms of blood poisoning."

As the evidence of the attending physician and others gives a complete picture of blood poisoning, such as oftentimes results from severe wounds, and which sometimes affects the lungs, your committee are of opinion that this is an entirely meritorious case, and therefore report it back favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET BLADES.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (S. 2073) granting a pension to Margaret Blades.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Blades, widow of William Blades, alias Blake, late of Company D, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

This bill has passed the Senate, the report made thereon being as follows:

"Margaret Blades, the applicant, is the widow of William Blades, or Blake, who enlisted August 10, 1863, in Company D, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers, and was discharged June 21, 1865. At the time of the soldier's death, March 3, 1884, he was receiving a pension of $24 a month for 'gunshot wound of left leg and shell wound of right shoulder, resulting in total disability, equivalent to loss of a hand or a foot.' The widow's claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground, 'cause of death, articular rheumatism, not the result of wounds for which pensioned.' This rejection was affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, on appeal.

"The soldier, in his application, urged that his disabilities were greatly aggravated by rheumatism and neuralgic pains in the wounded limbs, and his widow testifies that these pains first made their appearance in those limbs soon after the soldier returned from the Army.

"Dr. S. M. Getchell testifies to having treated him for rheumatism in the wounded shoulder in 1871, when he was unable to work for five weeks on account of it. The examining board, July 11, 1883, rated his disability from rheumatism alone at one-half. Dr. George H. Cummings, who treated Blades 'frequently for rheumatic and neuralgic pains,' in the wounded limbs, and during his last illness, testifies: 'His disease and death were the result of the severe injuries received in the service.'

"Dr. Thomas A. Foster, who also treated him frequently, testifies:

"'It was my final opinion that his neuralgic rheumatism was the result of his army life and wounds.'

"Dr. Cummings also submits the additional testimony:

"'Saw him September 4, 1882; severe rheumatism in left leg, and almost useless right arm, requiring opiates. Although he has rheumatism lurking about, the rheumatic and neuralgic pains are local and situated at the points of injury. Disability for last two years has been total.'

"But, in opposition to this testimony, although the reviewer in the Pension Office approved the case for 'gunshot wound of left leg and shell wound of right shoulder, and results,' the medical referee decides that there was no pathological connection between the rheumatism and the said wounds, and the case was rejected, and the rejection affirmed on appeal on this opinion.

"In view of all the facts herein your committee recommends the passage of the bill."

We concur in the foregoing, and report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN CHILD.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (S. 1288) granting a pension to John Child.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of John Child, late a private in Company D, Sixty-second New York Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

This bill has passed the Senate, the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions being as follows:

"This bill is to pension John Child, a private in Company D, Sixty-second Regiment New York Volunteers. In his own statement, the soldier says he was wounded at the battle of the Wilderness, and sent to Fredericksburgh Hospital. In about three weeks returned to his regiment in the field, and on the 20th of June, 1864, was with others taken prisoner near the Weldon Railroad, and was sent to Andersonville Prison, where he remained about ten months, and through exposure, want of food, lying on the bare ground, and uncleanness, contracted scurvy, rheumatism, and ulcers.

"The Adjutant-General's report corroborates his statement as to capture and Andersonville imprisonment. Lieutenant-Colonel Nevins, of his regiment, says he was taken prisoner June, 1864, sent to Andersonville, and while in line of duty contracted the diseases from which he is suffering. Patrick Martin and Thomas Naylor, fellow soldiers, swear to his capture, Andersonville imprisonment, and resulting diseases.

"The surgeon of Togus Soldiers' Home, where he now is and has for a long time been, says he is suffering from chronic rheumatism and chronic ulcers in both legs. Another surgeon of the home says he has an eruptive disease, the result of severe and continued scurvy. Dr. Hill, of Saco, Me., who attended him at the home in 1873, says he had chronic rheumatism and ulcers caused by scurvy, and was in no condition to perform manual labor.

"The medical examiners all identify scurvy, and one rates his disability total.

"This man, since his discharge, has been in no condition to earn his subsistence. The greater portion of the time he has been in soldiers' homes or charity hospitals.

"The Pension Office rejection is based upon the statement 'that there are no records of the alleged scurvy and rheumatism, and the claimant's inability to furnish evidence.'

"Here is ample and positive proof of his capture and imprisonment—of his ten months' confinement in the Andersonville prison, from which few were liberated alive, and from which none were set free without disease. Necessarily there are no records of his disability unless there were prison records, which are not available—which would not be accepted if they were.

"There has been one special examination in the case, which was not productive of any revelations for or against the claimant, and upon this the reviewer indorses the opinion that it is not advisable to waste any more time or money upon it. The application was made fourteen years ago, and in the opinion of the committee justice to a man who experienced a living death at Andersonville and came out of it diseased has been delayed too long. The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Your committee adopt the report of the Senate committee as above, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY J. DAVIS.

Mr. HAUGEN called up for consideration the bill (S. 1111) granting a pension to Mary J. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Davis, dependent mother of the late Lorenzo Crittenden, an enlisted man in the naval service.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. PERKINS. This report has been made by Mr. BLISS, chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and has been carefully drawn. The Clerk has already read a page and a half, and gentlemen must be satisfied as to the justice of the claim. The report is a lengthy one, and I move, by unanimous consent, the further reading be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KILGORE. As far as the report has been read, it would seem the disability complained of was contracted in the war.

Mr. PERKINS. This man continued in the Army long after the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to dispensing with the further reading of the report?

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1111, adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions and recommend the passage of the act.

[Senate Report No. 43, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to Mary J. Davis, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant is the mother of the late Lorenzo Crittenden, who was ward-room steward on board the United States ship Guerriere. As to his service the Third Auditor says:

"He enlisted on the Ohio June 15, 1867, was transferred to the Guerriere the same day, and served on that vessel to May 15, 1869, when he was discharged."

He had previously enlisted and served on the United States ship Pawnee, and served out the term of his enlistment, when he was discharged.

A claim filed by him for pension, in consequence of disabilities incurred during his service, was pending at the time of his death, which occurred at Sailors' Home, Quincy, Mass., January 22, 1880.

The mother's claim was rejected July 18, 1885, "on the ground that the sailor's death was not the result of disease incurred in the service and line of duty, but, as indicated by the report made upon special examination, most probably the result of vicious habits."

This is certainly the conclusion of the special examiner appointed to investigate the claim, but in the opinion of the committee it is not justified by the testimony filed in the claim, nor does it furnish any information in addition or contrary to that already produced. The origin of the disease is shown by the testimony of his comrades.

Joseph Fletcher and Henry Peters swear that they knew Crittenden since the year 1867, being on the same ship with him; that they well remember his sickness on board the Guerriere by reason of the positions, Fletcher being steerage cook and Peters being ward-room waiter; they knew from the conversation of the doctor that Crittenden was sick with rheumatism.

Benjamin F. Page swears to his personal knowledge of the man and of his sickness on board the same vessel.

George F. Long swears that he was in the service with Crittenden, and knows he was sick before and after discharge.

William E. Corthel swears that he knew Crittenden since 1862; in 1869 and 1870 worked for the same man, and during that time he was lame and used up with rheumatism in left side, leg, and ankle; saw him often until he went to the Quincy Home, and afterwards saw him frequently and noticed that he was partially paralyzed.

William T. Prindell swears that he first knew Crittenden in 1867, and in October, 1869, sailor came to him lame and sick with rheumatism in left side, leg, and ankle. He offered to work without wages if witness would take him in. Witness did so, and Crittenden worked about the dining-room, at times so used up that he could do little or nothing. At this time Dr. Leighton boarded with witness and prescribed for both of them for rheumatism. In May, 1870, witness became embarrassed and gave up business, and Crittenden went to work for P. S. Wetherell on or about the same terms as for witness, and Dr. Leighton also boarded with Wetherell and prescribed for sailor. As witness and Crittenden were afflicted in the same way, it is natural that witness remembers that Crittenden kept getting worse and worse, and his disability increased until he became paralyzed. Dr. Leighton is dead, and Wetherell has lost his mind.

Samuel D. Harrington and John P. Fitzgerald swear that sailor was treated from November 1, 1869, to the latter part of 1871 by Dr. Leighton for rheumatism, and he was not able to keep employment on account of his disability. Patrick Fitzgerald and Joel Wilder knew Crittendon from 1869 to 1871, and boarded where Crittenden worked; knew that he had rheumatism off and on all the time, sometimes being confined to bed.

Philander T. Wetherell swears to Crittenden's being in his employ from November, 1869, to fall of 1871, and was attended by Dr. Leighton, now dead.

Dr. Thomas Hall swears that he was Crittenden's physician four years and attended him various times for chronic articular rheumatism, from which he was never entirely free; and latterly for uræmic convulsions, followed by paralysis of left side, rendering him perfectly helpless.

Dr. Faxon, superintendent of Quincy Home, says Crittenden was admitted to home December 27, 1875. Disease, paralysis. No treatment aside from battery. Died January 22, 1880. Cause, paralysis, which, he says, was caused by tobacco.

It may be here remarked that the paralysis ensued "chronic articular rheumatism," from which the man became partially before he was wholly paralyzed. He was a great and almost helpless sufferer from this first cause, and it seems a little strained and far from consistent to trace paralysis to tobacco.

These witnesses are all residents of Boston, Mass.

There were two special examinations, the first in Washington, the last in Boston. In the first there were no developments. The last was an ex parte investigation. No one representing the interests of the claimant had anything to do with it. In this examination Isaiah Prindell appears as a witness. He begins by saying that he is not certain, but thinks he knew Crittenden before 1860; and then goes on to testify in reference to him, as to his condition prior to his voyage on the Guerriere. "It was about 1865 or 1866 that he worked for affiant." He knows of his going to the home on account of the rheumatism and paralysis. He does not know how he incurred rheumatism, but he said it was in the service. While he knew him his habits were fair. He smoked some; don't know that he chewed any. Did not smoke much.

Mrs. Mary Snow testifies in this examination, but it is principally as to what she does not know.

The doctors who treated him in hospital and at the home differ in their testimony. Some say he drank and smoked excessively. Some say he had delirium tremens, others not. Dr. Hall never saw him drunk. Testifies from memory. Dr. Faxon, of the home, says his disability when admitted to the home was paralysis; he died of general debility resulting from that; don't know that paralysis was the result of rheumatism; he really worried himself to death—disappointed that he could not recover from his paralysis. He did not drink, but he smoked; he (Dr. Faxon) served tobacco to all who were able to use it. Some he cut off, they were not strong enough. He could not say that tobacco caused his death. Again he says his paralysis was caused by tobacco; reason for this opinion is his conversations with him; he never examined him. George F. Going, his shipmate, sailed with him from Boston to Rio Janeiro. He used to smoke, and took a glass occasionally; never saw him the worse for liquor.

William E. Corthel, who testified in the special examination, says his habits were good; never saw him under the influence of liquor; saw him many times day and evening. "It was not a fact that he was a hard drinker or smoker, saw him every day or two for nearly two years; he smoked cigars; he used to drink beer; have seen him and know."

Samuel D. Harrington, in special examination, says he was not a bad drinker; never saw him intoxicated; smoked like the average of men. This special examination has produced nothing new except some few contradictions.

A. H. Shattuck, Second Auditor's Office, in a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, written October 13, 1884, says as to the son's supporting his mother that he was in no condition to do so.

"He always expressed a desire to assist his poor old mother, who was once a slave, but circumstances prevented. The claimant, Mrs. Mary J. Davis, and her daughter live together and support themselves by taking washing. I always thought Mr. Crittenden in every sense a gentleman; his habits were temperate, and the officer in the hospital in which he died spoke of him to me in the highest terms."

Mrs. Davis and her children were slaves. They first belonged to John C. P. Peter, late of Montgomery County, Maryland. They afterwards became the property of Rev. Charles H. Nourse, of Georgetown, D. C., from whom Mr. W. W. Corcoran, of Washington, D. C., purchased their freedom. Lorenzo, the deceased son, was for some years after a servant in Mr. Corcoran's family. She has one daughter, feeble in health. The two have for years struggled to procure needful food by doing such work as they could get and were competent to perform. She was, beyond any question, a dependent mother, dependent, unfortunately, in the eye of the law, upon a sick and dying son. There is no pretense that the claim should not be allowed except that stated in the communication of the Commissioner of Pensions, that the son's death was attributable to "vicious habits." This inference can only be drawn from the contradictory testimony of some of the witnesses.

Lorenzo Crittenden was some five years in the service of the Navy. His last three years were in part spent in South American ports. The records of the Navy Department show that he was ill at more or less frequent intervals during the cruise. From the time of his discharge he was disabled, and his disability gradually increased until he was stricken down with paralysis, and death soon after ensued. The predominance of testimony is against the theory of vicious habits, and in the opinion of the committee, in view of the weight of respectable and convincing proof to the contrary, it is an unjust decision.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. JANUARY.

Mr. CLARK called up for consideration the bill (S. 1124) to increase the pension of John W. January; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John W. January, of Minonk, Ill., late of Company B, Fourteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $100 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1124, beg leave to report that they have considered the same and find that the report made by the Senate on said bill is correct, and adopt said report as their own, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 428, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill to increase the pension of John W. January, have examined the same, and report:

"The claimant was a member of Company B, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry. He was pensioned first at the rate of $50 a month, and last at the rate of $72 a month for loss of both legs. His case is one of peculiar and extraordinary interest. He was captured on Stoneman's raid, in July, 1864, and upon retreat from Macon was taken by six Confederate soldiers to Andersonville, and kept there until the fall of Atlanta made it necessary for the prisoners to be removed to prevent their falling into the hands of the Union forces. He thus tells his own story:

"'I was taken to Charleston, S. C., with others and placed by the enemy under fire of our own soldiers and gun-boats; remained here ten days, and was taken to Florence, S. C., where we passed the winter of 1864-'65, and on or about February 15 I was stricken down by an attack of swamp fever, and for three weeks remained in a delirious condition. The fever abated and reason returned. I soon learned from the surgeon, after a hasty examination, that I was a victim of scurvy and gangrene, and was removed to the gangrene hospital. My feet and ankles 5 inches above the joints presented a livid, lifeless appearance, and soon the flesh began to slough off and the surgeon, with a brutal oath, said I would die. But I was determined to live, and begged him to cut off my feet, telling him if he would that I could live. He still refused, and believing that my life depended on the removal of my feet, I secured an old pocket-knife and cut through the decaying flesh, and, severing the tendons, the feet were unjointed, leaving the bones protruding without a covering of flesh for 5 inches.

"'At the close of the war I was taken to our lines at Wilmington, N. C., in April, 1865, and when weighed learned that I had been reduced from 165 pounds, my weight when captured, to 45 pounds. Six weeks after I was released, while on a boat en route to New York, the bones of my right limb broke off at the end of the flesh. Six weeks later, while in a hospital on David's Island, those of my left had become necrosed, and broke off similarly. One year after my release I was just able to sit up in bed, and was discharged. Twelve years after my limbs had healed over, and, strange to relate, no amputation was ever performed save the one I performed in prison. There is no record in the world similar to mine. My family consists of my aged parents, my wife, three sons, and three daughters.'

"This statement is vouched for by persons of the highest character.

"Seventy-two dollars a month is the highest pension rate provided by law. In view of the agony, mental and physical, which this man endured while a prisoner, and for many years after; of his physical helplessness, and the inadequacy of his present rating to the support of his family, the committee are of the opinion that this is one of those rare instances in which Congress may extend relief.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

In view of the facts your committee recommend that said bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BRIDGET FOLEY.

Mr. CHIPMAN called up for consideration the bill (S. 1447) granting a pension to Bridget Foley; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Bridget Foley, widow of Joseph Foley, late private in Company K, Fifth Michigan Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1447) granting a pension to Bridget Foley, submit the following report:

Bridget Foley is the widow of Joseph F. Foley, late a private in Company K, Fifth Michigan Cavalry. Her claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disease of which he died existed prior to enlistment. Twenty or more witnesses testify that he entered the service a sound man. They were in a position to know. There is no evidence to the contrary, except that contained in the certificate for discharge for disability, in which the officer making it says that he learns from a reliable source that he had rheumatism before he enlisted.

The affidavit of Captain Clark, who signed the discharge, shows that he made this statement upon what some one told him. Charles Brooke, who served in a fire company with the deceased before his enlistment, induced him to enlist, and served with him afterwards, testifies that he incurred the disease (rheumatism) while marching through a heavy snow storm, one of his feet being inflamed and swollen. He was discharged on account of this disease, suffered from it ever afterwards, and finally died of it. There is no doubt as to the cause of death, and witness after witness testifies to the soundness of the deceased before he entered the service. He seems to have been regarded as a very good soldier in all respects.

There is no doubt that some persons are more susceptible to certain diseases than others, and the fact that an individual actually contracts a disease after exposure under which others escape it does not tend to prove that he had the disease before enlistment, but that the effect of exposure on him was greater than on the others.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH B. SAILER.

Mr. ARNOLD called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 160) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Sailer; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Sailer, of Washington City, D. C., widow of Frederick Jacob Sailer, late a private in Company L, Fifteenth Regiment Heavy Artillery, New York State Volunteers, on the roll of United States pensioners, with the rate according to law, to commence from the date of approval of this act and continue during her widowhood.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "Frederick," in line 7, and all after "volunteers," in line 9, to end of the bill, and insert "F." after "Jacob," in line 7.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 160) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Sailer, respectfully report:

A similar bill was favorably reported to the House in the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, but was not reached for consideration.

Said report was as follows:

"[House Report No. 3762, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

"The claimant is the widow of Jacob F. Sailer, who served as private in Company L, Fifteenth New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers, from June 22, 1863, to August 22, 1865, when mustered out with company. He never applied for pension, and died February 11, 1882, in the city of Washington. The widow filed her application for pension April 1, 1882, which has been rejected on the ground that the evidence is not deemed sufficient to connect the death cause with the service. This action was based upon the certificate of death, signed by one Dr. L. E. Rauterberg, to the effect that the soldier died of inflammation of the stomach and enlargement of the liver, while the claimant alleges that the death was caused from chronic rheumatism and its effects.

"The record does not show treatment in the service; in fact there are no medical records of the organization on file. It does show, however, that the soldier was employed with the ambulance train of the Fifth Army Corps during the latter part of his service.

"Hugo G. Eichholz, a well known citizen of the capital, and the late sergeant of the soldier's company, testifies that the latter was a strong and healthy man until about March, 1864, when he was taken with rheumatism and malaria while the command was encamped at Brandy Station, Va., during a long spell of cold and rainy weather; was sent to hospital and did not again return to the company while affiant was with the same. Again met the soldier in 1868, and was on visiting terms with him until his death. During that entire period soldier was a great sufferer from rheumatism and became greatly reduced in health.

"Moritz Lowenstein, late lieutenant of Company D, Fifteenth New York Heavy Artillery, testifies that the soldier was taken sick at Brandy Station, sent to hospital, and did not meet with him again until April, 1869, at which time he was reduced in health and a great sufferer from rheumatism.

"Christian Neumann testifies that soldier was free from bodily ailments from 1856 until his enlistment, and that upon his return home in August, 1865, he was unable to ascend the steps to his house without assistance, and was for a long period thereafter confined to his bed by reason of rheumatism.

"Rudolph Gebney, late sergeant of soldier's company, testifies that the latter was first attacked with rheumatism at Brandy Station, Va., and again at Fort Albany, in July, 1865, where he was sent to hospital, and was unable to accompany his regiment to New York for muster-out. Met the soldier again in 1870, and knows that ever thereafter he was a sufferer from rheumatism, and under medical treatment.

"Mrs. Magdalena Wiener likewise testifies to Sailer's disability from rheumatism from about April, 1866, to his death.

"Dr. A. Behrends testifies that he treated the soldier from 1873 up to within a few days of his death, for rheumatism and its allied diseases, from which he finally broke down. The heart and viscera were particularly implicated.

"Dr. Mauss testifies that he was called to attend the soldier on January 5, 1882, and found him suffering from chronic rheumatism of long standing. There being no prospect of any cure, deponent did not repeat his visit.

"Dr. Rauterberg testifies that he attended the soldier from January 19 to February 11, 1882, when he died. He was suffering from chronic gastritis and enlargement of the liver, followed by anasarca. Understood at the time that the patient had been a constant sufferer from rheumatism since the war.

"The claimant states that Dr. Rauterberg saw the deceased twice only, January 19 and February 11, 1883, the date of his death, and that at the last visit, a few hours before death, declared the deceased out of all danger.

"The history of the case warrants the conclusions that the soldier was a constant sufferer from rheumatism contracted in the service of the United States; that the heart and other organs of the body became affected therefrom, and finally caused death. There was no post mortem examination to ascertain definitely the real cause of death. Dr. Rauterberg's diagnosis of the case is in conflict with that of Drs. Behrends and Mauss. Dr. Behrends, who stands high in his profession, and treated the soldier for nine years and until within a short time of his death, is corroborated in his diagnosis of the case by Dr. Mauss, who evidently had as much opportunity to study the man's ailments as did Dr. Rauterberg.

"Believing that the claim is meritorious, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word 'Frederick' in line 5, and inserting the word 'Frederick' after the word 'Jacob,' in line 6."

Your committee, adopting the views presented in said report as their own, recommend the passage of the bill, with amendments, as follows: Strike out the word "Frederick" in line 7, and all after "volunteers" in line 9 to end of the bill, and insert "F." after "Jacob" in line 7.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORT—HENRY PULSKY.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, called up for consideration the bill (S. 702) granting a pension to Henry Pulsky, reported adversely; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Pulsky, late a private in Company I, Second Massachusetts Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 702) granting a pension to Henry Pulsky, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from an examination of the papers in the case that the same is still pending in the Pension Office and ready to be placed in the hands of a special examiner.

In view of this fact, your committee decline to take action on the bill, and, returning the same, recommend that it lie on the table.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

GEORGE C. CHASE.

Mr. GROUT called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9119) granting a pension to George C. Chase; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George C. Chase, late of Company F, Third Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R.

9119) granting a pension to George C. Chase, having considered the same, report as follows:

Soldier enlisted November 13, 1861, as a private in Company F, Third Regiment Vermont Volunteers, for a term of three years. He served until July 29, 1862, when he was discharged because of the existence of an oblique inguinal hernia on the left side. Soldier applied for pension, alleging that he incurred a rupture in consequence of a barrel of beef rolling on him which he was endeavoring to load in a wagon, but his application was rejected on the ground that the hernia existed prior to enlistment, and on appeal the decision of the Pension Office was affirmed.

The evidence, pro and con, is as follows:

When soldier was discharged from the Army the regimental surgeon gave it as his opinion that the rupture existed before enlistment. No reason is given for his belief on this point, nor is any explanation vouchsafed how soldier managed to perform his duties in the Army for eight months if he was in a ruptured condition at the time of enlistment.

In addition to this evidence against the soldier is that of Examining Surgeon Orlando W. Sherwin, of Woodstock, who examined soldier December 10, 1881, and who discovered not only a small hernia in the left side but also a large one in the right side; and this medical officer of the Government declined to give a rating in the case because, as he says, "I think the disabilities did not originate in the service." He does not trouble himself to explain why he thinks that the disabilities, one or both of them, might not have originated in the service, but contents himself by saying he thinks they did not.

This is all the evidence filed against the claim, except the statement of the captain of the company, who, at the time of the alleged accident, was sick in hospital at Philadelphia. He says he had no knowledge as to the incurrence of the rupture, being absent from the company at the time, but that he had conferred with two soldiers of the company, and they hadn't any faith in the claim. He admits, however, that he thinks the soldiers were prejudiced against the claimant.

On the other hand, Charles Humphreys says that he knew claimant intimately for five years before he enlisted; that he worked for his father, doing the heavy work on the farm, and that he knew him to be free from rupture.

Lorenzo W. Shattuck, William J. Durphy, and George W. Durrell swear that they worked with claimant, and were in bathing with him frequently, and that they never knew or heard of his being ruptured before enlistment.

Albert Willard and Melissa Willard, in a joint affidavit, state that claimant worked on their farm at the time of his enlistment, and that so far as they knew he was in good health and free from rupture.

Charles Boyce swears that he was soldier's tent-mate in the army; that he knew him for five years before enlistment; that he was perfectly well up to the spring of 1862, at which time he showed deponent a rupture in his left groin.

Dr. D. M. Goodwin, assistant surgeon of soldier's regiment, and now of Minneapolis, Minn., testifies as follows:

"Said Chase was, as I have no doubt whatever, a sound and able-bodied man at enlistment. He was disabled in the line of his duty at Savage Station, Va., by rupture in the left groin, about the 20th day of June, 1862, caused, as was alleged, by lifting beef into an army wagon, Chase being at that time a wagoner. He was fitted with a truss the following day, and was subsequently discharged on account of his said injury, at Harrison's Landing, Va. I am personally knowing to said facts."

Your committee are strongly of the opinion that the weight of proof rests with the claimant in this case, and therefore report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask for a division.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman from Texas be good enough to state what his objection is to this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. It does not seem to me the report states such a case as would justify this House in granting a pension. There does not appear to be any evidence of a positive character.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will notice, there is evidence of a positive character in the report.

Mr. KILGORE. What is it?

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will look at the report he will see that it is there stated:

On the other hand, Charles Humphrey says that he knew claimant intimately for five years before he enlisted; that he worked for his father, doing the heavy work on the farm, and that he knew him to be free from rupture.

Lorenzo W. Shattuck, William J. Durphy, and George W. Durrell swear that they worked with claimant, and were in bathing with him frequently, and that they never knew or heard of his being ruptured before enlistment.

Albert Willard and Melissa Willard, in a joint affidavit, state that claimant worked on their farm at the time of his enlistment, and that so far as they knew he was in good health and free from rupture.

Charles Boyce swears that he was soldier's tent-mate in the army; that he knew him for five years before enlistment; that he was perfectly well up to the spring of 1862, at which time he showed deponent a rupture in his left groin.

Dr. D. M. Goodwin, assistant surgeon of soldier's regiment, and now of Minneapolis, Minn., testifies as follows:

"Said Chase was, as I have no doubt whatever, a sound and able-bodied man at enlistment. He was disabled in the line of his duty at Savage Station, Va., by rupture in the left groin, about the 20th day of June, 1862, caused, as was alleged, by lifting beef into an army wagon, Chase being at that time a wagoner. He was fitted with a truss the following day, and was subsequently discharged on account of his said injury, at Harrison's Landing, Va. I am personally knowing to said facts."

There is testimony of a positive character by the surgeon of his regiment.

Mr. KILGORE. I will withdraw my demand for a division.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommedation that it do pass.

KEZIAH E. STRONG.

Mr. GALLINGER called up for consideration the bill (S. 1142) granting a pension to Keziah E. Strong.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Keziah E. Strong, widow of the late David Strong, a private of Company F, Fifth Regiment of Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pension, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1142) granting a pension to Keziah E. Strong, having considered the same, report as follows:

This bill has passed the Senate, the report in the case being as follows:

"The claimant is the widow of David Strong, who was a private in Company F, Fifth Maine Volunteers. She asks a pension on the ground that his death was due to his service, and her claim is rejected because she has not been able to prove this to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions.

"He was but a short time in the service, having received an injury at the time of the Bull Run retreat, and on account of which he was discharged. His comrades testify that he was sound when he entered the service, and that he was never well after he left it. The doctor who attended him for many years and down to the time of his death is dead. His widow testifies that her husband's books show that the soldier was treated by him from 1864 to 1874 at various times, but the entries do not show for what disease.

"The soldier's certificate of discharge says he is unfit for the duties of a soldier by reason of chronic inflammation of the ligaments of the metatarsal bones. It is in evidence that he was run over and injured in the foot and leg and shoulder; that from these causes he was always more or less disabled; that he never recovered from them.

"The claimant has not been able to comply with the requirements of the Pension Office as to the proof demanded, on account of the death of physicians and officers of his military organization; but it is shown that he was discharged on account of an injury received as alleged; that he never recovered from the disabling effects of that injury; that he was almost continuously under treatment from its incurrence until he died.

"It would seem to be no injustice to concede his widow a pension, in view of the fact that he was never able to labor for her sufficient support during his life after discharge, and that the injury and the struggle for subsistence may well be regarded as the cause of his gradually increasing helplessness and ultimate death.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

In addition to the facts set forth in the report of the Senante committee, as above, a careful examination of the papers seems to fully justify the granting of a pension in this case. It is shown that soldier was sound at enlistment; that he was detailed as a wagoner at the first Bull Run battle, and that he came in lame and injured, from which he never recovered. He died on December 23, 1874. As he did not himself apply for a pension, the widow found it impossible, after so long a lapse of time, to secure the technical proof required by the Department. She is now nearly eighty years of age and in necessitous circumstances, and your committee report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. Did the injury for which pension is asked take place during the war?

Mr. GALLINGER. It did.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH F. JONES.

Mr. GALLINGER called up for consideration the bill (S. 886) granting a pension to Sarah F. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah F. Jones, widow of Albert L. Jones, late of Company B, Sixth Maine Volunteers, deceased.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 886) granting a pension to Sarah F. Jones, having considered the same, report as follows:

The Senate report is full and conclusive in this case, and your committee adopt said report as their own and recommend the passage of the bill. The Senate report is as follows:

"The claimant is the widow of Albert S. Jones, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment Maine Volunteers. Her husband was pensioned for gunshot wound of neck, and died July 10, 1868. His term of service is thus shown by the record: 'Enlisted July 1, 1861; discharged July 24, 1865.' He died July 10, 1868; his widow filed application for pension October 15, 1868, and her claim was rejected February 7, 1877. From this action an appeal was taken, and the Secretary of the Interior sustained the Pension Bureau, basing his decision on the statement of the medical referee, who says:

"'The record and other evidence does not warrant the opinion that death from disease of the lungs and heart and paralysis was due to impure vaccination. Syphilis, however acquired, seems to have been a factor in the death cause, and can not be eliminated.'

"The history of this man's service is that he was wounded, first by what is called a gunshot wound in the neck, the ball entering the neck four inches below the ear, or near the collar-bone, passing downwards and backwards to a point opposite the shoulder-blade, where it made its exit. After this wound he was never fit for active service; he was much in hospital, and was finally transferred to Invalid Corps. It is also of record that he was a prisoner; that, according to the report of one of the examining surgeons, he was wounded in the leg, the muscles of which were injured and the leg weakened; and that he had rheumatism in the Army and after his discharge.

"Two of his comrades, who were in the same company and hospital, say he was vaccinated in January, 1864. This was after his wounds in the neck and calf of leg, and several sicknesses; and they swear that his arm was full of sores from vaccination, so that he was sick. That he was furloughed on account of the effects of the vaccination. They were with him and know. These affiants saw him often after his discharge, and until a few weeks before his death, and during all this time the sores upon his arm continued to break out. One of these witnesses was the sheriff of Hancock County. Other witnesses corroborate this, and say that the sores continued up to 1868.

"Another comrade, who was in the same hospital ward with him, says they were there four months. They were both vaccinated, but not by the same surgeon. He testifies to the sores and hearing the doctor say they were caused by the vaccine matter.

"Dr. Parker, of Ellsworth, Me., testifies to his belief, from intimate knowledge of the man and of his condition, that the soldier's sickness and death were the result of his service.

"Dr. Fogg, of Holden, Me., knew the soldier from his birth. In June, 1868, he was called to attend him, and found him suffering from disease of lungs and heart. Ten days before he died his right side was paralyzed.

"John F. Whitcomb, first lieutenant of his company, says between his discharge and death he was never well.

"The only reference to syphilis the committee can find is that contained in the report of the Surgeon-General, in which he says he was transferred to Harper's Ferry with this disease, December 6, 1864; whereas the Adjutant-General's report shows that December 8, 1864, he was in Newton University General Hospital, Baltimore, from Winchester, Va., with diarrhea. There are other discrepancies in dates that are inconsistent with the syphilis theory.

"The doctors who treated him, the Pension Office examining surgeons who examined him, make no reference to syphilis. The medical referee bases his opinion upon the Surgeon-General's report, which is generally defective, and in this instance conflicts with other reports and other evidence. The committee believe the medical referee had no just grounds for such a decision; that all the evidence as to prior soundness, good habits of the soldier, as to the incurrence of his wounds, of his poisoning, his continued sickness and suffering, in which there was no interval, justify the belief that his disabilities were all contracted in the service, and that they were the cause of his death.

"The failure to discover 'pathological connection' is one of the obstacles in the way of many a just claim, and in a case such as this, in which it took nine years to decide it, and in which the evidence is clear, positive, and from the most reliable sources, the committee is of the opinion that Congress will not exceed its prerogative in reversing the decision."

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that members present be permitted each to call up a bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is too late to proceed in that manner now. It is near time for the committee to rise.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 11, noes 23.

MRS. ELIZABETH WHITE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. KERR) was the bill (S. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth White, mother of Charles H. White, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

That they adopt the following Senate report upon said bill, and recommend the passage of the bill:

[Senate Report No. 889, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant is the mother of Charles H. White, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers. The son died at St. Louis, May 4, 1862 only a very short time after he was mustered into the service. He was a mere youth when he enlisted, only sixteen years of age, too young and insufficiently developed for a soldier's hard duty; nevertheless he was accepted and sent to the front, with the speedy fatal result revealed by the record.

The simple history of the case is that prior to his enlistment the son lived at home with his father, and that together they worked a small farm. After the death of the son the father struggled alone, borrowed money from time to time to eke out a support, and finally his indebtedness accumulated to such an extent that he sold his property, the proceeds of which were absorbed in satisfying a mortgage and other obligations. For years the father had heart disease and other infirmities, some of which are traced back to 1863. His disabilities increased, rendering him helpless for years as a provider, and finally he died, leaving his widow old and poor. Dr. Russell, of Monticello, Iowa, treated him from 1862 to 1870 for valvular heart disease. He suffered much and was obliged to keep quiet. He kept no record except a day-book, and these were destroyed from year to year, but he identifies his treatment and dates by incidents.

Dr. Millette knew him twenty years. He was troubled with valvular disease of heart. The first he knew of it professionally was four or five years before his death; but Mr. White told him he had been troubled with it a number of years, and the doctor remembers of hearing, for the last dozen years or so, that he had occasional fainting spells. Has indistinct recollection that he had kidney disease. This he delivered to the special examiner. In a direct affidavit he says: "Prior to 1868 I knew little of his physical or financial condition."

M. L. Carpenter, banker, of Monticello, says what land he owned was very poor. He borrowed money of him to live on. His credit was good, because he was honest. The banker bought the farm and paid the larger portion of the purchase-money with offsets. This is to the special examiner. In a direct affidavit he says: "After paying off his mortgage he had nothing left. Thirteen years he knew him to be failing in strength. The produce of his farm after paying interest was not sufficient to support himself and his wife, and in order to support them in a frugal way he had to encroach upon his property." He goes on to say that after paying interest and taxes they would have only $50 left. They were quite poor.

There is some discrepancy in the direct testimony and that delivered to the special examiner, but it is a well-established fact from the evidence produced that the mother was dependent in the strict sense of the term, and that in later years she has suffered much because her dependence has not been recognized by the source from which relief should have come.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROSALOO SAGE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. CLARK) was the bill (S. 2137) for the relief of Rosaloo Sage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rosaloo Sage, late of Company A, Eighth Iowa Infantry, subject to the requirements and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

That they adopt the following Senate report upon said bill and recommend the passage of the bill:

[Senate Report No. 890, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant was late a member of Company A, Eighth Iowa Infantry. He enlisted September 5, 1861, and was discharged June 3, 1863. He applied for a pension August 22, 1883, and the long interval between his discharge and the filing of his application is referred to as a prejudicial circumstance. It may be as well to mention here a fact that is well known to the public, which is that hundreds of soldiers defer their applications until their growing disabilities and actual poverty compel them to apply for relief to a source from which they know they will encounter numberless obstacles, long delay, if not final rejection, and the alternative of an appeal to Congress.

The evidence in this case is principally the product of special examinations, and even under this critical process there appears nothing prejudicial to, but everything in favor of, the claim.

Nearly all of the witnesses testify that prior to his enlistment he was in good health and a strong, active man; that ever after his discharge he was in poor health. The organization to which he belonged participated in the engagement at Pittsburgh Landing. Mr. D. P. Meredith, a merchant at DeWitt, Iowa, was one of his comrades. He became acquainted with claimant after their enlistment. They were in the same mess. He has no recollection of his being sick until they arrived at Pittsburgh Landing, about the last of March, 1862. He thinks his disease was diarrhea, which was prevalent from the effect of bad food. He remembers that claimant was in the ranks the first day of the battle. Affiant was taken prisoner.

J. C. Wilkes testifies to having known claimant since 1855, and says he was in good health until after his discharge, when he was in bad health. They were neighbors and he saw him every day. He does not think he ever had good health after he left the Army.

Referring to the bad food which the men had to subsist on, Alfred B. Smith tells the special examiner that they had to grind the screenings of wheat and make bread from the flour, which, with bad beef, made the men sick. The claimant was under the doctor's care half the time.

Another comrade testifies that at a place called "Pancake Hollow" they lived on "slapjacks," made of musty flour, the product of spoiled wheat.

Thus the foundation of his sickness is explained. He contracted chronic diarrhea, which, in the progress of years, developed into alternate constipation and looseness. Heart disease ensued, and its existence is recognized by the examining surgeons. The Pension Office is unable to trace the connection. The doctors admit that the irregularities of the heart are not so great when constipation gives way to diarrhea. There can be no doubt that chronic constipation interferes with the regular and healthy action of the heart, which, in aggravated cases, causes prostration and ultimate death. It is affirmed by all the affiants that this man is trusty, truthful, and in every respect of good report. He was industrious, and struggled hard to avoid coming to want and the alternative of applying for a pension by working a little at his trade of carpenter.

It is possible that if he could have lived at his ease, free from the care and anxiety his poverty imposed, he would not have been so physically helpless as he is now. It is not to be turned against him that he so long resisted the resource to which he is at last driven. Special Examiner E. D. Godfrey thus closes his report:

"From the examination of the evidence on file at this date (June 16, 1887), I am of the opinion that it is sufficient to warrant the admission of the case without further examination."

Beyond any doubt his sickness, suffering, present prostration, and poverty are chargeable to the Government. The committee concur with the special examiner, and report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MCKINNEY. There is a bill which was passed over, Mr. Chairman, and I ask unanimous consent to recur to that.

Mr. CHIPMAN. We will scarcely have time to pass those bills that we have considered to-night even if we rise now; and I can not withdraw the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the special order, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the bills considered at the last evening session, or which were made special for last evening, be passed over informally, retaining their present status.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That leaves them exactly in their present condition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the effect.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham;

A bill (H. R. 8574) granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward;

A bill (H. R. 8794) granting a pension to Levi Little;

A bill (H. R. 817) granting a pension to Mary Foster;

A bill (H. R. 8677) granting a pension to Mary E. Forren;

A bill (H. R. 160) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Sailer; and

A bill (H. R. 9119) granting a pension to George C. Chase.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4098) granting a pension to Eliza Trefren; and

A bill (H. R. 7510) granting a pension to Stephen A. Seavey.

The bill (H. R. 5530) for the relief of Thomas Harris, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, was ordered to be laid on the table.

Bills of the Senate of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole favorably, were considered, ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, were passed, namely:

A bill (S. 1495) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McGee;

A bill (S. 2073) granting a pension to Margaret Blades;

A bill (S. 1288) granting a pension to John Child;

A bill (S. 1111) granting a pension to Mary J. Davis;

A bill (S. 1124) to increase the pension of John W. January;
A bill (S. 1447) granting a pension to Bridget Foley;
A bill (S. 1142) granting a pension to Keziah E. Strong;
A bill (S. 886) granting a pension to Sarah F. Jones;
A bill (S. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth White; and A bill (S. 2137) for the relief of Rosaloo Sage.

The bill (S. 335) granting an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, was considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bill as amended ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

The bill (S. 702) granting a pension to Henry Pulsky, reported from the Committee of the Whole with adverse recommendation, was ordered to be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

"MUCK-A-PEC-WAK-KEU-ZAH."

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6764) to grant a pension to "Muck-a-pec-wak-keu-zah," or "John," an Indian who aided in saving the lives of many white people in the Indian outbreak in Minnesota in the year 1862.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Muck-a-pec-wak-keu-zah, or "John," an Indian of the Dakota or Sioux tribe, now residing near the city of Hastings, in the county of Dakota, in the State of Minnesota, and who rendered valuable services in behalf of the white settlers, and who was instrumental in saving the lives of many white people during the Sioux outbreak and war in the State of Minnesota in the year 1862, and who then served the United States as a scout, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) is a follows:

That it conclusively appears that this Indian performed important and valuable services in behalf of the whites during the Indian outbreak, and subsequently was on the frontiers of Minnesota and Dakota in the years 1862-'63, as a scout and under the command of General H. H. Sibley, then in command of that district; and that while defending the whites he received injuries at the hands of hostile Indians and from exposure while such scout, which have permanently disabled him and injured his health.

The following is a memorial from General Sibley to this Congress in behalf of this Indian, and shows him to be worthy of a pension from this Government:

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"The memorial of the undersigned, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general United States Volunteers, in command of the military district of Minnesota, respectfully represents: That Muck-a-pec-wak-keu-zah, commonly known as 'Indian John,' was employed by me during the outbreak and subsequent war with Dakota or Sioux Indians on the frontiers of Minnesota and Dakota in 1862-'63 as a scout, and in that capacity rendered essential service, and was instrumental in saving the lives of white women and children; that while in the service he received injuries from exposure and violence at the hands of hostile Indians which have permanently affected his health and prevented him from properly supporting his family; that he and they are utterly impoverished, and have to depend for subsistence on the charity of the whites; wherefore your memorialist respectfully recommends and urges that your honorable body pass an act for the relief of the said Muck-a-pec-wak-keu-zah, in view of his helpless condition and former meritorious services to the Government, granting him such provision per month during his natural life as will enable him and his family to live in comparative comfort.

"And your memorialist will ever pray, etc.

"HENRY H. SIBLEY,
"Late Brigadier and Brevet Major-General U. S. Volunteers.

"ST. PAUL, MINN., March 21, 1888."

The additional evidence submitted to the committee shows that this Indian is a full-blood Sioux and now of the age of seventy-five years; that he was living at Redwood, on the Sioux Indian reservation, at the time of the outbreak; that he did all in his power to induce the Indians not to raise up against the whites, but failed; that in aiding a mother and four children (the husband and father having been killed) to escape, he was followed by other Indians, and while protecting said mother and children was struck in the breast with a musket and knocked down, and his ribs were broken; that after many difficulties he succeeded in getting the mother and children to his tent, where he kept them for about four weeks; that he rescued others in the same manner and guarded them until General Sibley came and rescued the white prisoners which the other Indians had, when he and those whom he had defended returned with General Sibley to Fort Snelling.

Drs. Adams and Haws testify that his disability totally incapacitates him for manual labor of any kind. Other witnesses testify sustaining our conclusions.

Your committee regard this as a truly meritorious case, and inasmuch as this Indian is uneducated, and will find it difficult to understand all the proceedings necessary to enable him to secure a pension in the regular way, we deem it but just that he should be granted a pension without being required to undergo further medical examination to establish his disability.

We therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to specify the amount of pension which he is to receive, and that that amount be fixed at the sum of $15 per month, and that as so amended the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDONALD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FANNIE A. KIMBALL.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2890) granting a pension to Fannie A. Kimball.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fannie A. Kimball, the blind daughter of Charles A. Kimball, deceased, late sergeant Battery D, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, at the rate of $18 per month.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

That said Fannie A. Kimball is the blind daughter of Charles H. Kimball, who was a sergeant of Company D, First Regiment Rhode Island Light Artillery, and enlisted in 1861, and died in the service in 1863.

His widow and said daughter were pensioned until the remarriage of his widow and the daughter had reached the age of sixteen.

There is no general law for the pensioning of the daughter when over sixteen years of age; but the relief proposed by this bill has been granted by special act of Congress in a number of similar cases, and is within the limitations established by your committee and sustained by the House both in this and previous Congresses.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY C. DAVIS.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10318) granting a pension to Mary C. Davis and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mrs. Mary C. Davis, formerly widow of William M. Worsham, major of the Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

Mary C. Davis resides at Danville, Ky., and is sixty-four years of age. She married William M. Worsham on the 5th of September, 1844, in Wayne County, Kentucky, and he enlisted in the Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, on the 3d day of October, 1861, and was regularly mustered into the service of the United States Army as a major of said regiment on the 31st day of January, 1862, for three years.

Maj. William W. Worsham, while in the line of his duty in the military service of the United States, and while on the march from Shiloh to Corinth, in the State of Mississippi, in the year 1862, contracted camp diarrhea and became wholly disabled from said disease, and unable to perform military service, and applied to the proper military authorities and to those in command of his said regiment for a leave of absence, that he might return to his home in Kentucky and recruit his health; but at that time no leaves of absence or furloughs were granted to officers or enlisted men, and as his death seemed inevitable he resigned his commission, which was accepted on account of his severe illness, and he immediately started to his home with a brother officer in July, 1862; but he died before he reached home, on a steamer on the Ohio River on the 18th day of July, 1862, of the said disease, contracted as aforesaid while in the service of the United States.

After the death of Major Worsham his wife, Mary C. Worsham, married Schuyler B. Davis, in Boyle County, Kentucky, and remained his wife until his death, which occurred on the 10th day of February, 1883, since which time she has remained a widow.

She had no children by either of her husbands, and is now old and in feeble health, and has not sufficient estate for her support, having derived little or no means from her first husband, Major Worsham, and only a small amount from her late husband, Schuyler B. Davis. By her own industry she has been trying to make a livelihood, but increasing years and feeble health make it very difficult now for her to secure such a support as she deserves.

The facts herein referred to are supported by the evidence of W. A. Haskins, lieutenant-colonel and in command of the Twelfth Kentucky Infantry, of which regiment William M. Worsham was major at the time he resigned, and also by Lawrence H. Rousseau, who was afterwards commissioned colonel of said regiment, and by others, who also show that Maj. William M. Worsham was a gallant officer and was faithful to all of his duties as an officer and soldier from the time he entered the service of the United States until the time of his resignation. Your committee believe that the name of Mary C. Davis should be placed on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and they recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN J. MITCHELL.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8460) to place the name of John J. Mitchell on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John J. Mitchell, late of Company A, One hundred and tenth Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

John J. Mitchell enlisted September 4, 1862, in Company A, One hundred and tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged 9th day of June, 1865. The evidence on file in the Pension Department shows this man's condition to be deplorable. Without means, supported and cared for by a devoted wife, helpless as a child, and a hopeless imbecile. The evidence further shows that he was a healthy, robust man when enlisted, a brave and faithful soldier, receiving a high character as such from the officers and privates of his regiment.

The evidence filed in his case is very voluminous, based upon a hospital record that when admitted to Finley Hospital, Washington, D. C., he was suffering from syphilis, which fact was contradicted by his regimental surgeon and his physicians after his discharge from the Army; but the Pension Department, evidently believing that disease was the cause of the present condition of the claimant, and that he had the disease because the record was supported by claimant's statement, made after his mind was destroyed and after he had been in the asylum for the insane, finally ordered a special examination of the claimant upon that special matter, and the report of the examining surgeons by the Government vindicated his family physicians by reporting there was no cicatrice, scar, or change of tissue, or any evidence whatever that claimant was ever the victim of syphilis. That effectually disposed of that supposed cause of claimant's unhappy condition. The evidence disclosed that his parents lived to an advanced age, and that there was no taint of insanity in the family. This brings us to the evidence of the cause of plaintiff's disability.

Dr. F. C. Owen, a physician of high character, and regimental surgeon of the One hundred and tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, states:

"That he personally knew said Mitchell, and that in the fall of 1863, in consequence of excessive exposure, the said soldier was attacked with a severe congestive type of neuralgia of the head, and that he treated him in regimental hospital, but was obliged to send him to general hospital in Washington City called Finley Hospital."

The Department made a special inquiry into the character of Dr. F. C. Owen, and reported his character good for truth, and that the physician was very positive of treating said soldier for neuralgia of the head in the fall of 1863.

Teray S. Jordan, a member of Company A, One hundred and tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, states positively that Mitchell was sent to hospital in Washington, in October, 1863, complaining of his head, and in a subsequent inquiry by the Department states that he knows of his personal knowledge that Mitchell was taken sick in October, 1863, and was treated by Surg. F. C. Owen, and after a short time was sent to a hospital in Washington, D. C.

William A. Shuler remembers Mitchell being sent to the Washington hospital suffering with a severe pain in his head.

W. M. Edge remembers Mitchell giving out on the march and being sent to the general hospital in October, 1863. Mr. Edge was afterwards transferred to Signal Corps, and did not meet Mitchell until the return home after the war in 1865, and states that Mitchell had the appearance of being broken down in health.

The above-named witnesses all sustain a high character for truth, and it would strongly indicate that the disability was incurred in the Army, but unfortunately for establishing the case of claimant as continuing disability the physician who attended him in his frequent attacks of neuralgia of the head up to 1868 is dead. The claimant, according to the testimony of his wife, had frequent recurrence of the disease, but would labor when able to do so, and at other times prostrated and partially insane until 1880, when he grew rapidly worse. Dr. Gray, Dr. Parker, Dr. O'Ferral, and others who attended him, all testify to treating him at various times for severe attacks of neuralgic pains in the head, which finally resulted in partial paralysis and dementia.

Dr. O'Ferral, in reply to the direct question of Special Examner Fuller, of the Pension Department, stated:

"That the present condition of Mitchell is the result of exposure, heat, and overexertion at a date remote from the present, and gradually resulted in his present trouble and condition."

The evidence of continuation of disability from time of discharge was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the law under the rulings of the Pension Department. The origin of the disease is clearly established. Its continuation after the war rests upon the evidence of the wife and other parties, owing to the death of the attending physician. The evidence and medical opinions of physicians of high character called to attend Mitchell at a later date, and the present deplorable condition of Mitchell, all combine to render this a meritorious case for the action of Congress, and your committee do therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARCUS D. RAYMOND.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2012) granting increase of pension to Marcus D. Raymond, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marcus D. Raymond, late a corporal of Company I, Twentieth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and a private of Company B, Fortieth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the amount per month he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2012) granting increase of pension to Marcus D. Raymond, have had the same under consideration, and adopt the Senate report, as follows:

"The applicant was a corporal in Company I, Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers, from October 10, 1861, to May 12, 1862. He afterwards served as a private in Company B, Fortieth Kentucky Volunteers, from June 15, 1863, to December 28, 1864. In 1863 he received a gunshot wound in left side, for which he was treated in hospital two months. In 1876 the soldier filed an application for a pension for the above-alleged disability. It was granted at $2 per month, commencing May 13, 1862; $6 from December 31, 1864; $10 from February 4, 1879; $12 from March 5, 1884, and was reduced to $8 from September 4, 1885, on the recommendation of the examining surgeon.

"Subsequently he filed a declaration declaring additional disability, alleging injury to left elbow and right wrist, received by falling from a horse while on night messenger duty. The soldier was not able to establish the origin of the latter claim to the satisfaction of the Department, and the case was placed in the hands of a special examiner, who is of the opinion that the injuries were sustained in the service as alleged. The examining surgeon gives him a total rating.

"After a careful review of the evidence the committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: In line 9 strike out the word 'thirty' and insert instead the word 'twenty.'"

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. W. ROSE.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7160) granting an increase of pension to A. W. Rose, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of A. W. Rose, and pay him a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of any pension he may now be receiving under the general law, by virtue of certificate numbered 80590.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The soldier in this case, Abner W. Rose, enlisted in Company E, Third Tennessee Cavalry, at Big Barren, Ky., February 1, 1863, and served continuously until August 3, 1865, when he was honorably discharged from the service.

It appears from the records and papers on file in this case that at the battle of Sulphur Trestle, Ala., September 25, 1864, this soldier was severely wounded in his left arm and chest.

In his original declaration for pension, filed February, 1866, he alleges as a ground upon which he bases his title to pension this gunshot wound of arm and chest. As early as 1866 he was examined by a board of United States examining surgeons, who found that the axillary nerve and artery of the arm had been divided, and that the arm was permanently weakened and totally disabled. He was pensioned April 24, 1867, for wound of left arm at the rate of $6 per month. The wound of chest apparently was not taken into consideration at this time. His pension was increased to $8 per month in September, 1869, upon the result of an examination by Dr. Bailey, a United States examining surgeon, who describes his disability at that time as follows:

"That a missile entered left arm 6 inches below the shoulder and at the outer aspect, coming out at the axilla, just exactly opposite to the point of entry. In the inside of the arm is a cicatrix, and the line or direction of the missile in its course through the arm * * * would indicate that the ball entered the chest. There is an abnormal respiration over the left side of the chest, a slight bronchophony below and just in front of the cicatrix in the side of the chest. There is a dullness on percussion over the whole cardiac region, indicating hypertrophy and effusion in the pericardium. It is my opinion that the ball entered the chest, and is still lodged in the neighborhood of the base of the heart."

He was reduced in March, 1872, to $4 per month, but in September of the same year he was restored to his old rate.

The board of examining surgeons who examined him in August, 1872, after having described his condition about the same as contained in Dr. Bailey's statement, certify that the ball may be, and probably is, not far from the base of the heart:

"That exertion causes dyspena, and he is unable to labor; his physicians state that he has frequent attacks of sickness, attributable to the wounds. Mr. Rose is a man of good habits."

They rate him total for the disability at this time. In 1880 soldier was granted a rerating, on account of gunshot wound of left arm and chest, at the rate of $8 per month from August 4, 1865, $6 per month from December 4, 1871, and $8 per month from September 4, 1872.

The board of surgeons at Baltimore, who examined him in July, 1880, certify:

"That they find gunshot wound of left arm and chest, ball entering outer aspect of the middle left arm, above and behind humerus, and emerged at the upper part of the axilla, and re-entered the chest 2 inches below the first exit, penetrating the lung and remaining in; alleges that at the time he was wounded he had severe and copious hemorrhages from the lungs; alleges, upon exertion, that he has cough and shortness of breath, pain under lower angle of right scapula; occasionally has vertigo, which causes him to fall."

These three surgeons find his disability as described above to be equal to and entitle him to total rate.

The following August a board of surgeons in Washington, D. C., examined this soldier, and certify that—

"The ball entered the outer aspect of the middle third of left arm, passed upward and to the right, coming out near the center of left axilla, re-entering the chest 1 inch below and to the right of axilla, and, he says, still remains. There is slight dullness on percussion in the region of the wound; some loss of sensation on side of left forearm and hand; loss of power in arm and hand; indolent ulcers on outer aspect of lower third of both legs, on right very large, on left smaller."

This board, after carefully examining the soldier, rate him as total.

A board of surgeons, in September, 1873, found over an inch difference in circumference of the soldier's arms, and this difference between his arms appears to have been the same since his first examination.

The soldier was examined in August, 1885, by the board of surgeons at Knoxville, Tenn., and upon examination of the applicant this board found objective conditions which, in their judgment, entitled him to an increased rating.

"He has a tender scar at the insertion of the deltoid muscle; missile grooved the posterior border of the humerus. There is another wound in the axilla; there is an indentation on the margin of the fourth rib, with no visible point of exit; * * * the whole left arm is less than the right; complains of numbness in the fingers; face is somewhat cyanosed; heart action feeble and sounds very indistinct; the area of the cardiac; * * * dullness somewhat increased; exertion runs the pulse up to 130."

They further state that—

"From the existing condition and the history of this claimant, in their judgment the disability was incurred in the service, as is claimed, and that it has not been prolonged or aggravated by vicious habits, and that he was, in their opinion, entitled to the total rating for disability caused by gunshot wound, and three-fourths rating for that caused by heart disease, a sum which aggregates fourteen-eighteenths of third grade."

In August, 1887, he was examined by a board of surgeons at Morristown, Tenn. The same description, almost identically, was given by this board. They rate him for gunshot wound of left arm and chest one-half third grade, not taking into consideration his disability from heart disease and affection of the lungs, which evidently are a result.

The incurrence of the wound, as alleged, in the service; the fact that the soldier has suffered from its effects ever since; the present existence of the ball in the immediate vicinity of the heart are established beyond question by cumulative evidence. Accepting these facts, the only question upon which your committee have to pass is whether the soldier's present rate of pension is commensurate with his disability.

There is no doubt in the minds of your committee but what this soldier has been a terrible sufferer by reason of the wound incurred in service and line of duty. It is established beyond question that he suffers from heart disease, which is readily attributable to this wound. He has an affection of the lungs, which is apparently the natural result of a wound where the ball penetrates the lung. The soldier's left arm is greatly reduced in size and is comparatively of little service to him. The wound in the breast, as before stated, has evidently given rise to severe affection of the lungs and heart. The soldier is thus rendered unfit to perform any manual labor requiring the least exertion on his part.

Dr. Parker, a physician and surgeon of high standing, of Knoxville, Tenn., under date of May 18, 1887, gave this soldier a careful and thorough examination, and it might be well to cite the result of this examination in connection with the conclusions reached upon this bill.

Dr. Parker says:

"1. That there is an old cicatrix from a gunshot wound of the left arm, the wound of entrance being just below the insertion of the deltoid muscle and a little to the posterior aspect of the * * *. The range of the ball is upward and inward, having passed through the border of the po-terior aspect of the humerus, leaving a wound on the inside of the arm at the inferior margin of the anterior boundary of the axilla. From thence the ball penetrated through the fifth intercostal space, leaving a scar at the point of intersection of a line drawn around the chest 2½ inches above the nipple and a vertical line will fall over the left coracoid process. The course of the ball after penetrating the parieties of the thorax I do not know positively.

"2. * * * Exploration reveals the absence of vesicular murmur in the upper portion of the left lung a little below the clavicle, and there is adhesion of the pulmonary tissue in this locality, with obliteration of the air vesicles, from the sternum to the left wall of the chest. I regard this as the result of the destruction of the tissue in the track of the ball and the inflammatory action subsequent to the shot. There is an irritable condition of the heart, with adhesions between the pleura and pericardium, and a direct mitral murmur. Pulse, when quiet, 90; on exertion, 130. Respiration, quiet, 22; on exertion, 32.

"3. There is a partial paralysis of both motion and sensation on the ulnar portion of the forearm and of the little and ring fingers. This I attribute to injury of the ulnar branch of the brachial plexus. There is atrophy of the muscles of the left shoulder and arm. I regard this as due to non-use. I have taken no subjective symptoms."

The existence of the ball in the vicinity of the heart is apparently liable to cause death at any time; and while in ordinary cases your committee are averse to recommending a disturbance of rates granted under the general law, they are clearly of the opinion, from the facts presented in this case, that the rate allowed this soldier has not in any way been commensurate with his disability, shown to have existed, and to have been due in the main to the disability for which he is pensioned. They therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOUK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (the hour of 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore, in pursuance of its previous order, declared the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. GLASS: Joint resolution (H. Res. 197) referring the claim of Norah Walsh to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COMPTON: A bill (H. R. 10819) for the relief of Dr. J. Felix Morgan—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. J. E. CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 10820) granting a pension to George M. Ziegler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEARD: A bill (H. R. 10821) to correct the military record of George McKinney, jr.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McCREARY: A bill (H. R. 10822) for the relief of V. C. Lasley—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10823) for the relief of James F. Blount—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MORRILL: A bill (H. R. 10824) granting a pension to Mary A. Van Buskirk—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. C. A. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 10825) granting a pension to Mary Jane Jelly—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. G. M. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 10826) for the relief of Richard Davis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. YODER: A bill (H. R. 10827) for the relief of Catharine Teegardin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LIND: A bill (H. R. 10828) granting a pension to Braddock F. Stocking—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JEHU BAKER: Petition of Thomas Lloyd, Charles Hildebrand, and 31 others, citizens of Rentchler, Ill., for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce act—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolution of Reliable Council, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Allegheny, Pa., in favor of Senate bill No. 553—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BIGGS (by request): Remonstrance against House bill No. 3067, to grant Boisé Basin Bed-Rock Flume Company the right to construct a bed-rock flume in Idaho—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BRUMM: Petition of Bittenger and others, citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, for amendments of the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BUNNELL: Petition of woolen manufacturers and wool dealers of Louisville, Ky., against the passage of the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Petition of James Keener, of Bartow County, Georgia, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COOPER: Petition of J. W. Dickerson and 38 others, of Pennsylvania; of William Herbert and 98 others, of Colorado; of T. J. Chittenden and 30 others, of Nebraska; of John H. Tuttle and 22 others, of Utah; of R. H. Pennington and 94 others, of Colorado; of D. H. Henderson and 33 others, of Ohio; of S. L. Moore and 67 others, of Pennsylvania; of E. C. Chapman and 73 others, of New York; of J. P. Romero and 32 others, of New Mexico; of S. C. Gordon and 36 others, of Ohio; of T. N. Lucas and 163 others, of Indiana; of John Andrews and 30 others, of Indiana; of J. W. Bryarly and 32 others, of Virginia; of Cantrell & Faulkner and others, of Tennessee; of T. Henderson and 28 others, of Kentucky; and of C. B. Ladd and 42 others, of New Mexico, for increase of the tariff on wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COX: Resolution of U. S. Grant Post, No. 327, Grand Army of the Republic of New York, recommending the passage of Senate bill 2797, to advance George Wallace Mellville—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, memorial of Gotham Assembly, and of the New York Plow Company, of New York City, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petition of Henry M. Barrett & Co., proprietors of the Eclipse Woolen Mills, and others, of Louisville, Ky., against the passage of the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DARLINGTON: Petition of woolen manufacturers, wool dealers, and others, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DE LANO: Petition of B. F. Bonney, of Hamilton, N. Y., for relief—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Petition of woolen manufacturers, wool dealers, and others, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAUGEN: Petition of woolen manufacturers and wool dealers, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HEARD: Paper in the case of Mary J. Malotte, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HIESTAND: Petition of woolen manufacturers and wool dealers, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. S. I. HOPKINS: Petition of manufacturers and dealers in wool, against placing wool on the free-list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOUK: Petition of wool-growers, protesting against placing wool on the free-list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McCLAMMY (by request): Petition of woolen manufacturers and wool dealers, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McCULLOGH: Resolution of Climax Council, No. 195, of Trovilla Council, No. 158, of Security Council, No. 168, and of O. W. Howell Council, No. 210, Junior Order of United American Mechanics of Pennsylvania, for the passage of Senate bill 553, for regulating and restricting immigration—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of H. O. Beal and 108 others, citizens of Edwards County, Kansas, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petition of manufacturers of and dealers in woolens, against the Mills bill in the reduction of the duty on wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RICE: Petition of 78 citizens of St. Paul, Minn., for the establishment of a system of harbors and water-works, etc.—to the Committee on Expenditures of the War Department.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: Petition of heir of Christopher Acklen, of Franklin County, and of administrator of Mrs. Devinda Crouse, of Rutherford County, Tennessee, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROCKWELL: Petition of P. H. Murphy and others, against reduction of duty on window-glass—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STAHLNECKER: Petition of U. S. Grant Post, No. 327, Grand Army of the Republic of New York, approving the proposed promotion of their comrade, George Wallace Melville—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, petition of the Tarrytown (N. Y.) Workingmen's Organization, asking certain amendments to the interstate-commerce act—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WEBER: Petition of woolen manufacturers, wool dealers, and others, against the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILBER: Petition of citizens of Dolgeville, N. Y., to protect the manufacturing interests of this country—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, against the destruction of the sheep industries of this country—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. YOST: Petition of Richardson & Co. and others, against the passage of the Mills bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. McCULLOGH: Of Jacob Swart and others, of A. B. Pratt and others, of W. H. Virgin and others, of Harrison Morris and others, of James M. Finell and others, and of Linsey Black and others, of Greene County, Pennsylvania.

The following petition for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. GRIMES: Of D. M. Hall, Wesley Jefferson, and others, citizens of Marion County, Georgia.

The following petition, praying for the enactment of a law providing temporary aid for common schools, to be disbursed on the basis of illiteracy, was referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. HERMANN: Of 49 citizens of Benton County, Oregon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SARAH L. LARIMER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2563) to compensate Mrs. Sarah L. Larimer for important services rendered the military authorities in 1864 at Deer Creek Station, Wyoming, and for loss of property taken by Sioux Indians; which was referred to the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following request of the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 12, 1888.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3215) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near Cummings Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the House bill reported on yesterday I believe is identical with that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Senate has asked to have the bill returned. If there be no objection, the Committee on Commerce will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and it will be returned to the Senate in accordance with the request of that body.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 474) for the relief of General G. Cluseret;

A bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

NEWSPAPERS, ETC., SOLD ON TRAINS, ETC.

Mr. PHELAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10829) to prevent discrimination in the selling of literary matter, newspapers, journals, periodicals, or magazines on railway trains, in railway stations, on steam-ships or steam-ship docks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS DROPPED FROM THE ROLLS.

Mr. LEE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives what action has been taken by him, if any, with reference to officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps who served honorably through the Mexican war, and whose names have been dropped from the rolls.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. In the interest of the officers of the House, some of whom are already sick in consequence of overwork at night sessions, I ask that the evening sessions hereafter be limited to half past ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. BLAND. It is not fair to require these officers to remain here such unreasonable hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has objected.

Mr. BLAND. I give notice that hereafter I shall object to all other night sessions unless the limit of half past 10 o'clock is fixed for adjournment.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to call up the Senate amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. PETERS. I believe I have twenty-one minutes left. I shall be able only in the time remaining to notice some of the objections that have been made to this amendment. The first objection was the Pacific mail scandal. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], almost shed tears over the fall of certain statesmen whose garments were singed and who were in position in this House when action was taken. I have no time to shed tears over the fall of any man who in public life permitted his political skirts to be besmirched by a corrupt lobby. He who accepts public position and then allows his action to be influenced either directly or indirectly by corrupt influences should be hurled from power without sympathy and without pity from the people.

We are here to deal not with the past, but with the present and the future. If the gentlemen are afraid to trust themselves, then they should resign and go home. If they can not withstand temptation, then this is no place for them. If they are afraid to trust their Postmaster-General with that discretion that is always necessary to accompany a lodgment of power, then he, too, should resign and give place to a man who has a firmer mold.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. I can not, because my time is limited.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the gentleman thinks there should be a great deal of sympathy for the corporation that corrupted the members.

Mr. PETERS. That may be the gentleman's idea, but it is not mine. He may have sympathy with such corporations, but it is known from my course in this body that I have none. It was not necessary for him to ask the question.

Because unholy influences entered this Hall years ago is no reason why we now, as the Representatives of the people, should hesitate to do our duty. If that is a correct rule of action then we should at once cut off from this bill all appropriation for star routes, because forsooth, in times past, fraud has been perpetrated in the expedition of that service.

We might as well abandon Christianity because a Judas betrayed his Christ. We might as well discard patriotism because a Benedict Arnold betrayed his country for British gold. We might as well wipe from our statute-books all laws punishing murder because a Guiteau assassinated a Garfield.

The second objection that has been urged is that we now pay a hundred and fifteen times more for mail than is paid for freight on these steam-ship lines. And has it come to this, that in this, the light of the nineteenth century, burning, live intelligence is to be placed on a par, on an equal footing with dead freight; that we are to pay no more to transmit the burning thought of intelligence, teeming with business hopes and inspirations than for the senseless mess pork or codfish of commerce? Out with such a comparison. It should have no place in this progressive age of ours.

Another objection urged is that the granting of this appropriation will embarrass the Postmaster-General and the Post-Office Department. The appropriation in this bill for carrying the mail from Tampa to Havana is open to the same objection. Every dollar appropriated for carrying the mail along our coasts is open to the same objection. Every dollar appropriated for carrying our fast mails upon our railroads is open to the same objection. Position, effort, and responsibility, requiring intellectual exertion, is embarrassing, but who ever heard before this reason urged for the standing still of our car of national progress?

Another objection urged by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was that it would create such an unnatural stimulus in the building of new lines that the competition would soon produce bankruptcy as it did in England and Germany some time ago. Our carrying trade, I think, can stand a good deal of stimulus; and when we reach that period when competition tends to bankruptcy, if we ever do, then we can withhold the appropriation. If the subsidies granted by the German and English nations flooded the seas with ships, and the proposition in this bill is a subsidy, then certainly it is a very strong argument in favor of our granting it, because our country certainly needs to have a stimulus; needs to have our seas flooded with American vessels. I for one should like to see a flood of that kind.

But here there is a glaring inconsistency in the argument of the opponents of this measure. In one breath they declare that it would so increase the number of steam-ship lines, would so increase the supply of vessels in the American carrying trade that each would have but little to do and become bankrupt. In the next breath they assert that the granting of these subsidies, as they call them, would not accomplish the result. It would not increase the carrying trade. It would not increase the steam-ship lines, and the Postmaster-General would be compelled to distribute the amount of money among lines already in existence. At least one of these positions can not be correct, and I suspect neither of them is correct. If the first position be correct, then we can remedy that by withholding the appropriation at the proper time. If the subsidies offered by the German and English nations did create an unhealthy stimulus, then that is the best evidence in the world that the subsidies granted were greater than necessary.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says the amount offered in this bill will not increase the lines, because of the increased cost of the construction of the American ship and the increased cost of the labor in running the ship.

His argument is, that you must either have free ships and cheap pauper labor or you must give four million of subsidy to place us on an equal footing with England and Germany. I wish I had time to talk for a few moments upon that question. We do pay more for labor than England does, because our labor is intelligent labor; because the sailor and the marine that goes down into the ship has the same power at the ballot-box that the President of the United States has. The American system treats him as a component part of our political government. Our laws treat him as an intelligent being, who has a right to aspire to the highest office in the gift of the people; as an intelligence that has a mind; a soul that has feeling, has sympathy, inspiration, intuition; that has a right to have a home and a fireside, a family circle and loved ones about him.

If it takes millions of subsidy from our overflowing Treasury to pay American workmen to build ships and to pay American sailors to sail American vessels to compete with England and Germany, then, rather than have the American ship-builder and his family go without bread and education and the American sailor and his family go without the comforts of life, then, I say, let the doors of the Treasury be opened and let the millions roll forth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You propose to convert the American ship-builder and the American sailor into a tramp and a vagrant and send their families to the almshouses of the land, because you can purchase English ships cheaper and hire English sailors at a less price. I am for the American workingman, the American sailor, the American mechanic first, last, and all the time, even though he may be a little more expensive than the English mechanic or the English sailor.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says the amount proposed in this bill will not accomplish the object; he says that we tried it from 1866 to 1871, and that each successive year our merchant marine grew less and less, and then went on in almost the same breath to answer his own argument, and show that the cause of the declension of the merchant marine was due to certain causes entirely disconnected with the law that he instances. He answered himself when he said that one of the causes of the decline of the merchant marine was the opening of the great West immediately after the war. The sailor and the marine who had served upon the sea during the war heard of "Uncle Sam's" farm west of the Mississippi—and he wanted a piece of it.

He ceased to be a seafaring man and became a wayfaring man, and traveled westward, and this desire to get western homes so decreased the supply of sailors that it made it almost impossible to get men to man American ships. But this was only one of the causes and was not by any means even the main cause. The war itself, the battle of the Monitor and Merrimac in Hampton Roads, the transition from wood to iron and steel, the treachery of England and the destruction of our marine by her privateers, are causes that led to this declension, and it would have taken millions upon millions of money to have stayed it, money which, at that time, our Government did not have; so that the declension of our merchant marine in the face of the appropriations that were made by the Government then is no argument against the appropriation now. Not one of the causes which produced that result exist to-day.

But there is still another reason why that was not a fair test, and why it is not an argument in favor of the position assumed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

The appropriation about which the gentleman talks was made to certain steam-ship lines; made not so much for the purpose of establishing new lines, but made, if possible, to save some out of the wreck that was going on.

The proposition to-day is entirely different. It proposes to set apart a fund to be used by the Postmaster-General for a certain purpose. Not a dollar of it is to be given to any particular line by name. It only authorizes the giving of an extraordinary compensation for carrying the mail to South America either by existing lines or by lines to be hereafter established. And gentlemen lose sight of another fact. It is not the mere carrying of the mail that is the object to be competed for by these various steam-ship lines. That is but a small item, a comparatively insignificant matter.

It is the commerce that the carrying of this mail will bring to the vessels that carry it that will be the great stimulus to the establishing of new lines. Why is it that steam-boats on our inland rivers advertise themselves as carrying the United States mail whenever they have that privilege? Why is it that ocean steam-ships plying between our country and foreign countries advertise themselves as mail lines?

It is because of the additional patronage that this brings.

Gentlemen say, "we know just what lines will get this money;" the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] ingeniously figures out just what amount will go to each line, and then they raise their hands in holy horror and say, "Do you want it to go to the Pacific Mail; to go into the coffers of Gould and Huntington and that class of rascals?"

I think more of the Postmaster-General than you seem to do. He was a class-mate of mine and I have confidence in him. I know that if he gives it to the Pacific Mail, or to the Brazilian line, he will do so because he can get the best service for the least money. He is not compelled under this amendment to give them any amount of money because the clause "not exceeding" qualifies the whole amendment. It is all idle to talk about the Postmaster-General not having a discretion under this amendment. He need give them only what he gives foreign steam-ships for carrying our mail. And here I want to allude to another fact. You gentlemen who talk so loudly against this proposition are talking in the interest of the subsidized lines of England, Germany, and France.

Defeat this proposition, and the result is in the interest of the English aristocrat, the German monopolist, and the French banker. You assist England to subsidize her lines; you enable Germany to rob us of a territory and a trade that belongs to us under the Monroe doctrine; you despoil our farmers of a market for their surplus products in a neighboring country for the benefit of foreigners and a foreign country; you close South American ports against the products of the labor of American workmen, and fill the sails of foreign vessels supplying a trade which rightfully belongs to us.

You cry out "Subsidy, subsidy, subsidy," and yet if this proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be a subsidy, then you by passing this bill vote like subsidies to get your mail carried in foreign ships. The law now authorizes the Postmaster-General to give to these foreign ships for carrying the mail the sea and inland postage. Do you give anything like such a sum to the railroads for carrying your mail? Do you give anything like such a sum to the star routes carrying your mails to your own people? Do you give anything like such a sum to your own people for carrying your mails anywhere? It is a gratuity you are giving to the foreigner. It is a gift you are giving to the foreigner. It is a subsidy you are giving to the foreigner, if the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a subsidy. For my part if we are to give these gifts and gratuities and subsidies I want to give them to Americans instead of English; I want to give them to citizens of the United States instead of to citizens of the German Empire; I want to give them to people who live here rather than to people who live beneath the French flag. Why is the name subsidy lugged in here where it does not belong? Why is the name of Gould and Huntington injected into this debate where it has no place?

Mr. DOCKERY. Because they are the beneficiaries.

Mr. PETERS. Who are the beneficiaries?

Mr. DOCKERY. Jay Gould and Huntington.

Mr. PETERS. I say the British monopolists that own the British steam-ship lines are the beneficiaries of the law that you argue in favor of, and desire to enact in the place of the law proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Choose ye between the British monopolists, between the British bankers and the German aristocrats on the one side and the American citizen on the other.

Gould and Huntington are referred to for the purpose of arousing your prejudices and warping your judgment. The opposition to this amendment is in the interest of British gold and German capital. For my part I have no love for Gould or Huntington. I do not know them personally. If what has been charged against them is true they deserve the most condign condemnation of the American people. If what has been said of them be true they are nothing but disreputable speculators. But they are Americans, and have property in this country, and pay taxes in this country, and help to support the Government. And if we are going to give gifts and gratuities and subsidies, if you please, for the purpose of getting our mails carried, and I must choose between an American speculator and a foreign aristocrat, I will choose in favor of the American every time. If the gratuity is given to them and they fail to render just and accurate compensation such as the contract required, then they are within our reach and amenable to our laws, while the English aristocrats, the German monopolists, and the French capitalists can snap their fingers at us and ask us what are we going to do about it? If you gentlemen who oppose this amendment desire to stand in the position of favoring foreign monopolies and foreign monopolists, that is your privilege. But as for me, my motto shall be "Americans, may they always be right! But right or wrong, Americans forever!"

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that upon the same ground we should stop the mail transportation over the Missouri Pacific Railroad, because Mr. Jay Gould owns a controlling interest in that line. I tell you, gentlemen, that argument will not stand the test of reason.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the object that is sought to be accomplished by the voting of this appropriation. What is the prize that we are seeking for? It is the trade and commerce of South America. South America, Central America, and the West Indies have a population of 40,000,000 of people. They have an area twice as large as that of the United States. Their exports and imports last year were over $700,000,000. It is that great trade that we are seeking. That is the object that we are striving for by this amendment. That is the prize that we are trying to wrest from Great Britain, from Germany, from Italy, from Holland, from Belgium, and from France.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Have you any evidence that this proposed amendment will reach the result you speak of?

Mr. PETERS. I have this evidence only, that whenever you increase the mail facilities between this country and that you thereby increase the commerce between this country and that, and this amendment will be a step in the direction of the object which we desire to attain. I do not claim that this amendment will accomplish the result at once. I claim simply that it is one step in the direction in which American progress and American thought and American hope and American inspiration point. [Applause.]

As an illustration of the wonderful growth and development of the countries whose trade we are seeking, I wish to call attention to the Argentine Republic. That republic has a population of about 4,000,000. They built, in 1887, over 5,000 miles of railroad, and they will have an immigration during the present year of over 200,000 souls. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, even if time permitted, I have no disposition to engage in an elaborate debate of the question now presented to the House. I rise for the purpose of placing upon record some information showing where the false sentiment which lies behind the idea of subsidy originates and how it is corruptly and clandestinely worked up. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter which I ask that he will read, including the printed caption at its head.

The Clerk read as follows:

[United States and Brazil Steam-ship Company, office of president, Mills building, corner Broad street and Exchange Place.]

NEW YORK, September —, 1887.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed small pamphlet contains, in a condensed form, a statement of a subject in which I believe you are interested. It has been sent to the President and members of the Cabinet, to members of Congress, and other influential persons. The officers of our Government are doubtless desirous of doing what is for the best interest of our country, but they are without knowledge of all the circumstances and doubtless believe they are representing public opinion in pursuing the policy they have in the past; but I firmly believe they are wrong in this.

They do not appreciate that all classes are deeply interested in restoring our commerce to its former position on the seas, and all it needs is an expression of opinion to those in authority, upon this subject, to induce them to take favorable action. If, after reading this little pamphlet, you agree in the views therein expressed, will you not write letters to President Cleveland and to Postmaster-General Vilas, at Washington, expressing the hope that they will use their large influence to reverse the policy of our Government toward our commercial marine which has resulted so disastrously, and inaugurate the same principle in the carriage of ocean mails as is practiced by us on land, namely, paying what the service is worth, regardless of the postage collected on any particular route? If you will also do the same with your member of Congress and United States Senator, and with the editors of papers with whom you may be acquainted or with whom you may do business, I believe that the business merits of the proposition are so plain that when they are known a public opinion will arise which will speedily overcome the false theories which have resulted so disastrously to our foreign commerce. Every man possesses some influence, and surely it can not be exercised in any better cause than this.

I shall also be pleased to have an expression of views from you upon this subject, and, if you desire, will forward you from time to time suggestions and information bearing upon this subject, but I trust that you will at once act upon the suggestion of writing the officials above suggested and also any other influential friends you may have.

Very truly, yours,

H. K. THURBER,
President United States and Brazil Mail Steam-ship Company.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I am advised, whether correctly or not I do not know, that the author of this letter is at the head of the largest wholesale grocery establishment in the world, certainly the largest in this country. He therefore is not dependent necessarily upon the bounties of the Government for a living. He is not a beggar from necessity. It is from pure choice or pure patriotism, or because it is fashionable and customary nowadays for others similarly situated to do it. It will be observed that this circular letter concludes by earnestly requesting my good farmer friend and constituent to give him an expression of his views on the proposition presented to subsidize the steam-ship line of which the writer of the letter just read is president. I send to the Clerk's desk, for the benefit of the distinguished author of that letter, the answer of my constitutent giving his views upon the subject of subsidies.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALMA, ARK., September 19.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of a letter and pamphlet—which I inclose—in which I am informed that I "am interested." Probably I am. I do not know, nor have I time to inquire or make the investigation necessary. I have, together with others, elected a man to look after my interest in these cases, and I have confidence in his ability and disposition to deal with them.

It looks a little to me like a "job." For that reason I send it to you, that you may know from whence emanates the backing for any letters you may receive from your constituents, as I suppose this document is likely scattered broadcast so as to come in on you at the "back door."

I will say this. If the object sought is to subsidize a line for export of merchandise I am opposed to it. We have "protected" our manufacturers until our people are unable—too poor—to consume their product; no "overproduction" in the case. Now, do they, the manufacturers, want the Government to transport our goods to foreign markets so that they can compete with honest men in the markets of the world? Are our "infant industries" to remain forever in a state of helpless imbecility?

Yours, truly,

J. K. P. DOUGLASS.

Hon. JOHN H. ROGERS,
Fort Smith.

Mr. ROGERS. That is the way this proposition strikes an honest farmer out in Arkansas; and I have no doubt that the Kansas farmers will begin to see just where and how the public opinion is manufactured which begets the zeal of the gentleman from Kansas who has just addressed the House.

If time permitted, I should be glad to read "between the lines" this letter from the distinguished president of the United States and Brazil Steam-ship Company. It deserves to be read "between the lines." It is due to myself to say that while I am compelled to accept the statement that a copy of this letter has been sent to the President, the members of his Cabinet, and to Senators and Representatives in Congress (because the writer is an honorable gentleman), I did not get my copy of this letter; and if it had not approached me, in the forcible language of my farmer friend, through the "back door," I should not perhaps have received it at all. But it came, and merits my attention.

I will take occasion at this moment to allude very briefly to this pamphlet which was inclosed to my farmer constituent; and I only wish time would permit me to analyze it. Among other things it states that Mr. Thurber out of pure patriotism has invested $100,000 in this business because, to use his own language—

It is a shame that American merchants should be obliged to send their letters to South America via Liverpool.

The pamphlet continues as follows:

He has since accepted the presidency of the line without pay—

And the words "without pay" are italicised, to give emphasis to the sacrifice—and is endeavoring to prove that Americans have sense enough to do as their successful competitors for the world's trade do, and as Americans themselves do on land, pay a fair price for mail service whether the postage in any particular route meets the expense or not. That man is H. K. Thurber, etc.

By what method is it that this patriotic, self-sacrificing president of the United States and Brazil Steam-ship Company proposes to demonstrate that Americans have sense enough to do as their successful competitors for the world's trade do? And what is it this guileless, innocent patriot wants? It is the "world's trade," and he proposes to have the people buy it for him by appropriations made to subsidize his own steam-ship lines, so that he gets the subsidy first and then he gets the world's trade to build up his mammoth business in New York, and all under the guise that it is—a shame that American merchants should be obliged to send their letters to South America via Liverpool.

In another place this pamphlet makes the inquiry:

Why not afford the American shipping industry adequate protection, as other industries are protected? When the industry was at its best there were 2,188 American ship-yards; they employed 21,345 hands; the annual wages paid them amounted to $12,713,815; the capital invested was $20,979,874, and the annual value of the product $30,890,327. It was an industry worth protecting.

When was it, Mr. Speaker, this happy condition of things existed? Was it under the auspices of this protective system, now invoked by this unsophisticated patriot, whose very bowels yearn for the honor and glory of his country, and who out-Jeremiahs Jeremiah in his lamentations over the decline of our merchant marine? Let his little pamphlet answer. Says he:

In 1856 American vessels carried 75 per cent. of all our imports and exports; in 1886 but 25 per cent.

The following table from the United States Bureau of Statistics shows the rapid decline of American and the rise of foreign shipping interests, and emphasizes in a stronger manner than anything we can say the folly of the one plan and the wisdom of the other.

Tonnage of American and foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States from foreign countries—

Year.	American.	Foreign.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
1851 to 1860	67	33
1881 to 1886	21*	79

* Now estimated at but 14 per cent.

And so it was in the good old Democratic days, when an American could buy his ship in any market and sail it under the flag of his own country, and none dared to molest him or make him afraid. It was long before the fallacious dogma ever found birth, that the way to make a people rich is to tax them, that the way to protect a people is to lay burdens on them and fetter and restrict their commercial relations with the world. But this very interesting pamphlet continues:

Americans are not inferior either on land or sea to any people in the world. Our wages may be higher, but our skill is greater; we utilize machinery to a greater extent; we are fertile in expedients; we get more work from the same number of men, but we can not overcome the fact that the governments of competing nations have supported their steam lines while ours has treated our shipping interests with indifference and neglect. One-tenth of the surplus in the Treasury, now acting as a menace to all industry, or one-quarter of the sum now authorized for the building of war ships, if expended over a period of ten years, would give us a fleet of swift merchant steamers that would carry our flag regularly into the principal ports of the world, that would utilize the products of our mines and our forests, that would furnish remunerative employment to thousands of our mechanics and laborers, and enable these materials and men to earn more than $100,000,000 annually in carrying our own products to market which now go into the pockets of foreign ship-owners.

One-tenth of the surplus in the Treasury now acting as a menace to all industry—

"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright." Why, had that sentence stopped there one might have thought it came from the President's message—"now acting as a menace to all industry." How do our Republican friends relish that? But let us proceed a little—or one-quarter of the sum now authorized for the building of war ships, if expended over a period of ten years, etc., etc., would furnish remunerative employment to thousands of our mechanics and laborers.

"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks," so this "childlike and bland" Samaritan yearns for the welfare of the "mechanic and laborer."

And enable these materials and men to earn more than $100,000,000 annually in carrying our own products to market which now go into the pockets of foreign ship-owners.

Foreign ship-owners? Why certainly not; that must be a typographic error. Certainly he means these enormous sums go into the pockets of the mechanics and laborers. What an embarrassing mistake that is. So we have it, that we must take one-tenth of the surplus, or one-fourth the sum now authorized to be expended for the building of war ships by our own people and give it to this unsuspecting gentleman; that the $100,000,000 annually carrying our own products to market, which now goes into the pockets of foreign ship-owners, shall be diverted from their pockets and turned into his.

Mr. Speaker, it can not be that so good and simple minded a man as this can be engaged in any "job." My clever constituent does him the grossest injustice. He is but following in the footsteps of innumerable other patriots in an honest effort to distribute the surplus so that our great industries may not be menaced thereby, nor their future plans disturbed by a reduction of taxation.

One more reference to this pamphlet and I am done.

Some people ask why it is that we can not compete with other nations on the ocean now as we used to do? It is not because of the change from sail to steam or from wood to iron; we have both of these to as great an extent as any other country; but it is because of the change from individual ships to steam lines, which cost so much to establish that it is beyond individual effort, and because other Governments—

I ought to stop right here to say that this great merchant prince tells us that these gentlemen are mistaken when they urge that aggregated capital can accomplish better results than individual enterprise.

And because other Governments, recognizing that "trade follows the flag," that "the commerce of the world commands the wealth of the world"—in other words, that steam lines build up their termini just as railroads do—have fed and nourished their steam-ship lines—

Now listen to this beautiful figure of speech—

"just as a bird feeds her young until they are strong enough to care for themselves."

Mr. Speaker, this beautiful simile attracted my attention, and it deserves notice for a moment. How sweet and beautiful the thought! We are to "feed and nourish" these great monopolies, to "feed and nourish" these merchant princes, to "feed and nourish" these millionaires, with all that kindly, self-sacrificing devotion with which the mother "bird feeds her young."

Yes, labor shall toil eight, ten, twelve, and thirteen hours a day in field, farm, and workshop, and bring its earnings to feed and nourish this "infant industry," conducted by this patriotic president of the United States and Brazil Steam-ship Company, who so loves his country that he invests $100,000 in this line, and becomes its president "without pay," to save his countrymen from the shame of having to send their letters to South America via Liverpool. How touching it is when he has achieved all this, to witness with what patriotic instinct, so closely akin to that which characterizes all the other privileged classes in this country, he turns and tells us that his little infant industry must be "fed and nourished even as the mother bird feeds her young."

Why, sir, this reminds me of a little conundrum that I heard the other day, which so well illustrates this situation that I must be permitted to refer to it. Some one asked "why it was that little birds in their nests should live in peace," and the answer was, "Because it is dangerous to fall out." [Laughter.] So these great industries, basking in the warm spring sunshine of legislative favor, live together in their soft, downy nest, made so not by their own earnest endeavor, enterprise, and thrift, but by legislative discrimination against the toiling masses; live in perfect peace and amity, because they know "it is dangerous to fall out;" and they all come, with their stereotyped letters, with their pamphlets, with their false and manufactured public sentiment, and demand that the hard earnings of the people be taken from them and dropped into their mouths, just as the mother "bird feeds her young."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have fifteen minutes which I reserved from my hour. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, in the event of the pending amendment being voted down, I shall offer, if permitted to do so, an amendment to the following effect:

To sustain the present, and to provide a more efficient mail service between the United States and Australia and New Zealand, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to pay for such service an amount of money equal to the amount received by it from such service for sea and inland postage.

In this proposition there is nothing in the nature of subsidy. It takes not one dollar from the Treasury of the Government. It simply proposes to give these lines what they earn and what they are entitled to for this service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. BINGHAM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen desiring to do so may have leave to print remarks on this subject.

There was no objection.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allowed to me I shall not attempt to do more than state what I conceive to be the general principles underlying the Senate amendment and the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. I will not be able to present so full an argument as I would if I had more time. Section 4009 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow, as compensation, if by a United States steam-ship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steam-ship or by a sailing-vessel any sum not exceeding the sea-postage on the mail so transported.

This, sir, is the measure of compensation now fixed for carrying the United States mails on the seas and oceans of the world. It is alleged to be insufficient. It is said that the compensation thus provided does not afford to the people of this country sufficient foreign mail facilities.

Now, sir, if that is an insufficient allowance for carrying the mails to the foreign countries named in the amendment, especially to the South American countries, no one will more willingly than myself vote to increase that compensation, so that there may be ample pay for the service required. There is a marked distinction between paying a reasonable compensation for proper mail facilities, and the bestowal of the largesses of the Government upon steam-ship companies to stimulate commerce and make the business pay the ship-owners.

The Senate amendment proposes to appropriate $800,000 out of the Treasury, not to pay for carrying the mails, but to be given to steam-ship companies at the rate of $1 for each nautical mile sailed, in addition to the sea and inland postage allowed by existing law. It is a subsidy, and is intended more for the purpose of stimulating trade and commerce between this country and those of South America than to provide just compensation for carrying the mails. The money in the Treasury is the common property of the people; it is collected from them by way of taxation, and the appropriation of it in the way of bounties and subsidies to some small portion of the people to make the particular business in which they are engaged profitable is favoritism, class legislation, and undemocratic in principle.

It is paternalism, and the same objection which lies against monopolies created by a high protective tariff lies against bounties and subsidies except in very rare instances. The principle I denounce is the injustice of taking by law the money of one man or set of men and applying it to the use and benefit of another. I believe in legislating for the impartial and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The paternal, partial, and unjust legislation of Congress, favoritism to particular pets as well as to corporations and classes for the last twenty-five years, is the prime cause of the discontent which to-day prevails among the poor and laboring classes of the people.

The proper business of Congress is, in pursuance of constitutional grants of power, to make general laws for the common benefit of all the American people.

The Congress of the United States should be as impartial as death, which knocks with equal hand at the door of the palace and cottage.

I am opposed to appropriating money out of the public Treasury to stimulate anybody's business in order to make it pay him. I have heard it asserted upon this floor that this proposition is similar to what is incorporated in the appropriation bills every year by way of provision for compensating the railroad companies for transporting the mails. I can not see it in that light. The railroad companies are compensated by some standard fixed at what is believed to be reasonable for the service rendered.

The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to fix the compensation of steam-ships for carrying the mails to South American countries, China, Japan, and Australasia at three times the present rate of sea and inland postage, and backs this up with an appropriation out of the Treasury of $450,000 for the next fiscal year. I do not know whether it is intended that this appropriation is to be used as a subsidy or not, but presume that it is intended to provide for the difference in present and the measure of compensation proposed by the amendment. If the latter is the proper construction of that amendment, it is not a subsidy, but is only a proposition to change the measure of compensation by making it three times what it is now. The author of that amendment contends that the present measure of compensation is too small. If I were satisfied of that I would vote to increase the compensation to the highest point of the actual value of the service.

I believe in liberal appropriations for mail facilities at home and abroad. It is nearer to the people than any other service except the work of the tax-gatherer. And if the commerce of this country with South American states is stimulated and benefited as an incident of our mail service it would be a source of gratification. But, sir, the United States through the stimulus of annual subsidies may build up a considerable trade with other countries, but when these are withheld it is doubtful whether it would survive. A foreign trade which comes to stay is that which is found to be so profitable as to induce capital and enterprise to engage in and develop it. That which is developed by artificial stimulants is like a hot-house plant—when the vitalizer is withheld it withers and languishes. The argument that England and other European countries have built a great commerce by the use of subsidies has but little weight with me. We are Americans, with a superior form of government, different institutions, traditions, and surroundings, and, in my judgment, European precedents have wrought more harm than good in their influence on the legislation of this country.

I am not satisfied that the present compensation is too small. I am a little apprehensive that it is not quite as great as it should be for the mail service to South American countries. I am not well informed upon this branch of the subject, and those who have had superior opportunity for obtaining information disagree about it. I am, however, less in doubt that the measure of compensation proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is too great. He and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], both exceedingly well informed, and for whose opinions in such matters I have very great respect, differ so widely that there is no possibility of reconciliation. I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and the Senate amendment being a subsidy and obnoxious to all the objections I have named, but not elaborated for the want of time, I shall never vote for it.

Mr. RAYNER. I merely arise to clear away, if possible, a misapprehension in connection with the subject of American shipping that seems to have taken a most remarkable hold upon public credulity. Mr. Blaine, some time ago, in a communication to an association of merchants in the city of New York, declared that England has continually stimulated the growth of her commerce by enormous bounties paid to those who build and sail steam-ships. The New York Chamber of Commerce repeated the statement, and, starting in this manner, it has re-echoed through the halls of almost every board of trade and shipping league in this country. After a patient examination of this subject, which resulted from my firm conviction that the shipping interests of a country could never be permanently maintained by any such process as this, I now make the statement, and am prepared to prove it with the details when the occasion requires it, that the commercial marine of Great Britain, the most powerful upon the seas, has neither been built up nor sustained by subsidies or bounties in any shape, and that we are not in the slightest degree following her example by adopting the wild schemes that are now being contemplated in order to restore American shipping.

Great Britain in all her history never appropriated a dollar of money for the purpose of aiding in the construction or employment of a British ship. France has done so, and unprofitably to a high degree, but England never, and you can not point me to an act of Parliament that ever voted a bounty or subsidy for any such purpose. She has helped to maintain a costly ocean packet service, which is just as necessary for her governmental purposes as a standing army or a tax levy; and it is because the character of this service has not been examined into that it is being constantly confounded with a system of bounties and subsidies to which it does not assimilate itself in the slightest degree. Before these schemes that are now flooding in upon Congress and purporting to follow in the wake of her example make any headway, let me impress upon you the fact that this packet service is employed for the purpose of carrying the mail; that her ocean mail is under the jurisdiction of her post-office department, open to public competition, and always awarded to the lowest bidder. That from 1872 to 1882 its expenditures decreased over £300,000 per annum, and, what is more important than all, two-thirds of the total outlay is annually repaid to the post-office department by the countries for whom the mail is being carried and by the colonial dependencies of Great Britain.

The Peninsular and Oriental Line, which steams to India, Alexandria, Australia, and Gibraltar, and virtually circumvents a territory that contains twenty millions of people dependent upon England and sending their exports and products free of duty into the English market, has never been nourished at the exchequer, as has been so persistently claimed, but procured the carriage of the mails because it was by far the lowest bidder, performing the service for 17 shillings per mile in vessels of largely increased horse-power in place of a service costing upwards of 30 shillings a mile in vessels of not half the power and of greatly inferior speed and construction. Mr. Guion, at the launching of one of the ships of the Williams and Guion Line some time ago, triumphantly declared, "We have never received a pound of Government aid. We do not need it and we will not ask it." The trouble about the matter is that our shipping leagues will not draw a distinction between an honest system, open to competition, allowing a liberal compensation for carrying the mails, and providing for a speedy passage and a prompt delivery under the strictest regulations and the severest penalties, such as the English system is and the contemplated American system, which unlocks the doors of your Treasury, opens the flood-gates of corruption, pays a premium to monopoly, and proposes to revive this lost American industry by a sort of galvanic process that will infuse into it the transient flush of fever instead of the permanent glow of health. There is no one in my presence more deeply anxious for the restoration of American shipping than I am. Restore it upon a natural basis, and not by artificial stimulation.

England is the mistress of the seas because she has freed her commerce and freed her ships; that is the truth, and we know it. We have enslaved them both, and we have foundered the best equipped and fleetest service that sailed the ocean in its day. We have enslaved the ship from keelson to truck. From the wire in her stays to the brass in her "taffrail log she is a slave." We have enslaved her cargo, because from the moment an American vessel touches at a foreign port high and prohibitive duties proclaim to the nations of the earth that a pirate's tribute is to be levied upon her freight, and that we give no quarter to the commerce of mankind. Had England continued such a policy as this, all the subsidies in her treasury would never have given her the position that she now occupies upon the sea. Like France and Germany, she has swept from her statute-books those relics of barbarism that punish a citizen for transferring a foreign ship to the flag of his country, and until at least we relieve our commerce from its burdens to some extent, we may dissipate subsidy upon subsidy, and bounty upon bounty, but the ships that leave the banks of the Mersey and the Thames and the Clyde will continue to command and monopolize the markets of the world though we place upon the sea the best equipped marine that ever trod the billows of the deep.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem that discussion of this question is likely to change the vote of the House and I had not intended to occupy any of the time of the House in expressing my views upon it. But on a policy which I deem so vital I am not willing to sit silent without raising my voice against the illiberal course which has been pursued by this country and is now being pursued against its own commerce.

If it is statesmanship to economize to the last farthing upon the transportation of our foreign mails, and to keep those mails as small as possible, in order that the cost of their transportation may be reduced to a minimum, then the course and policy of this Government is wise and statesman-like.

But if the correct and statesmanlike view looks to something beyond a mere niggardly and higgling bargain on the transportation of our mails; if it enhances a building up of our commerce and establishing cordial, extensive, and binding trade relations with our neighboring republics of Central and South America, then the policy pursued by this country is narrow and short-sighted.

I shall enter into no extended disquisition on this subject, but content myself with placing myself upon record in favor of the broader view of national policy.

Mr. Speaker, commerce follows in established lines of trade, and the use of the mails goes with commerce. If this country desires to wrest the commerce of Mexico and the Brazils from Spain and England into channels which, from vicinage and common interest and kindred forms of government, are the natural channels and belong of right to us, then this country must, by a liberal treatment of our infant industries and by a far-reaching policy, foster at once new avenues of trade and encourage our merchant marine as other nations who have succeeded in achieving a large foreign trade have fostered their new channels and aided their merchant service. Gentlemen, "there is a withholding which does not enrich, and a giving which does not impoverish," and among the most pre-eminent examples of this adage is the treatment of our struggling industries in the matter of our commerce.

Expend $800,000 in fostering our Central and South American trade, and you will bring ten times $800,000 into the coffers of our American merchants and ship-builders. Withhold your aid and send your mails by transient foreign ships, by ocean tramps, bound upon speculative ventures for their owners, in foreign competing countries, and you have checked commerce and retarded national growth. You have hidden your talent in the earth rather than put it with the exchangers, that it might gain other talents for its owners.

For these reasons I favor the pending amendment, as tending to a larger and wiser treatment of our merchant marine and our foreign commerce.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, this question has been very elaborately discussed upon both sides, and I think the House must be satisfied of the disposition of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to allow liberal debate. I shall feel it my duty at the end of my six minutes, if not earlier, to ask the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. Before I do that I want to make one additional observation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has spoken of the discretion given to the Postmaster-General by this amendment, and has said by way of illustration that the Postmaster-General has discretion in reference to a large sum of money for the payment of clerks in post-offices, and also as to various other funds.

Mr. Speaker, so far as the discretion provided for in the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania is concerned, the difficulty is not that it denies discretion to the Postmaster-General, but it is that while in terms discretion is allowed it is practically denied. For instance, we have but one line of steam-ships from this country to China. Prescribe that the Postmaster-General may allow that line three times the sea and inland postage in order to get the mails carried on a certain schedule. Remember that this is the only line, and suppose that the Pacific Mail Steam-ship Company should undertake to say to the Department: "Congress has given you the money to pay us three times the sea and inland postage; the compensation is reasonable, and we will not make any other contract with you." We put the Postmaster-General in a position where he must absolutely stop that mail or else yield to the demand. And so it is all along the line. Therefore the idea of discretion being given to the Postmaster-General by this amendment is delusive.

I will not occupy further time, and I now ask the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must ask the Chair to insist upon order in the Hall. Although the Chair has just stated the question, gentlemen are continually coming to me to ask what it is.

A MEMBER. I ask that the question be again stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], which is that the House do now recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to that amendment with an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This question, the Chair will state, is divisible, if a division of the question is demanded. That is to say, a vote may first be taken upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and then upon the simple motion to concur. If no division is demanded——

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BINGHAM, as follows:

Amend, in line 111, by inserting, after the words "West Indies," the words "Australasia, China and Japan, and the Sandwich Islands."

Amend, in line 112, by striking out "eight hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "four hundred and fifty."

Amend by striking out all after the word "service," in line 117, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And in cases where a contract shall be made in addition to the sea and United States inland postage allowed under section 4009 of the Revised Statutes to registered United States steam-ships plying between ports of the United States and Central and South America, the West Indies, Australasia, China and Japan, and the Sandwich Islands, the Postmaster-General may, by agreement with the owners of said steam-ships, at an equivalent consideration therefor, allow any sum not exceeding three times the sum of the said sea and inland postage to steam-ships running to such of the said countries as are in the Postal Union, and an equivalent sum to steam-ships running to such of said countries as are not in the Postal Union, for dispatching their vessels without failure upon certain days to be specified in schedules covering periods of not less than six months each, to be agreed upon in advance by the Postmaster-General and said owners or agents: Provided, That any failure to dispatch a vessel upon a schedule date may subject the owners or agents to a penalty not less than the sum to which the vessel would have been entitled for the conveyance of mails if she had sailed in accordance with the schedule; said penalty to be deducted by order of the Postmaster-General from any sums found to be due said owners or agents."

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the vote about to be taken includes, with the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or whether the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a distinct proposition?

The SPEAKER. There is no proposition pending excepting that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The House is now about to vote on that.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 135, not voting 134; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. BINGHAM was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, (during the roll-call), said: I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], who is sick; but as on this question he would vote the same way as myself, I vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the pairs.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. CUMMINGS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. COGSWELL.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. MERRYMAN with Mr. SYMES.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. DE LANO.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BELDEN.

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. BURROWS.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. BLANCHARD.

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. SCOTT.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. HIESTAND.

Mr. SIMMONS with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. JONES with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. MCCLAMMY with Mr. NICHOLS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, with Mr. YOST on this amendment and on the original proposition. Mr. YOST would vote "ay" and Mr. ANDERSON would vote "no."

Mr. WISE with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, for this day. Mr. WISE would vote against the amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill providing ocean mail pay.

Mr. PEEL with Mr. BURROWS on this vote. Mr. PEEL would vote "no."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, with Mr. BARRY. Mr. JOHNSTON would vote "ay" on this amendment and Mr. BARRY "no."

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. ROMEIS, until 3 p. m. to-day.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. DARLINGTON, until Wednesday, the 18th instant.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, until July 16.

Mr. TRACEY with Mr. PLUMB, on all questions, until the 17th instant.

Mr. HATCH with Mr. PUGSLEY, on all questions, for three days.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. GALLINGER, on all questions from the 12th instant, inclusive, until the 17th instant, inclusive, except the evening sessions of Thursday and Friday for pensions.

Mr. RAYNER with Mr. MCCOMAS, on all questions, until Monday next.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. MCKENNA, on all political questions, for Friday and Saturday, July 13 and 14.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. CANNON, for the day.

Mr. BUCKALEW with Mr. DALZELL, for this day.

Mr. FRENCH with Mr. GAINES, on all questions, for the day.

Mr. LAWLER with Mr. RYAN, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. LONG, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. BRYCE with Mr. DAVENPORT, on all questions, for the day.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. BOUTELLE, on this vote.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, with Mr. MOFFITT, on this vote. Mr. ANDERSON would vote "no" and Mr. MOFFITT "ay."

Mr. RAYNER. I voted inadvertently, not remembering my pair with my colleague [Mr. MCCOMAS]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, but I presume I had better withdraw my vote, and I do so.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. My pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has been announced. I desire to say that if he were present I should vote "no."

MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] is paired for to-day with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]; hence, as the pair announced between the gentleman from Michigan and myself does not apply to this question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated. [Applause.]

Mr. FELTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether it is now in order for me to offer my amendment, or for the chairman of the committee to accept it.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee can not accept the amendment; and the Chair, not knowing what the amendment is, can not say whether it is in order now or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House further insists on its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 7, and agree to the request of the Senate.

Mr. FELTON. I ask that the Clerk read the amendment which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

To sustain the present, and to provide a more efficient mail service between the United States and Australia and New Zealand, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to pay for such service an amount of money equal to the amount received by it from such service, for sea and inland postage.

Mr. FELTON. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment which has just been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same with an amendment. Does the gentleman propose his amendment as a substitute for the Senate amendment?

Mr. FELTON. Yes; as a substitute for the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is first on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON] for the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. FELTON'S amendment was disagreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. BLOUNT'S motion, that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 7, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. BLOUNT. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, nays 58, not voting 126; as follows:

So Mr. BLOUNT'S motion was agreed to.

During the call,

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] on the preceding vote to the one just taken, and being engaged in the room of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, did not get in in time to have the pair announced. If present, he would have voted "yea," and I would have voted "nay."

Mr. PAYSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE], but as he would vote the same way I will leave my vote stand.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. DOCKERY, and Mr. BINGHAM.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the call for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTE REPORTER.

Mr. BOOTHMAN, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That Edward D. Easton, now acting under the appointment of the Speaker as a substitute reporter for Mr. J. K. Edwards, who is confined to his bed by severe illness, be paid from the contingent fund of the House from the date of his appointment, June 11, 1888, and during his service as one of the reporters of the House, the amount of the current salary of said Edwards, with such additional sum as may be required for the payment of assistants; and this resolution shall not interfere with the receipt by Mr. Edwards of his full legal salary—

Accompanied with the following written report:

Your committee, to whom was referred the resolution named above, having inquired into the facts, find that J. K. Edwards, one of the Official Reporters of this House, was taken violently ill prior to June 11, 1888, and is now dangerously sick with a prospect of failing to recover during the present session. That Edward D. Easton, above referred to, has been employed in the place of Mr. Edwards temporarily. That from said June 11, 1888, Mr. Edwards has been paying Mr. Easton out of his salary for his service, and has paid quite a sum additional in order to get the stenographic notes of Mr. Easton transcribed and thus hold his place.

Your committee further find that Mr. Edwards is a man in poor circumstances and dependent upon his salary for the support of himself and family; that he was taken sick with a fever while employed by the House, and presumably because of his devotion to his duties as an officer of this House. Your committee think that, under the circumstances, the House owes it to itself to see that such a faithful employé does not suffer, and that he be permitted to retain his salary, and that his temporary substitute, Mr. Easton, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House as provided in the resolution as proposed to be amended, and that the cost of transcribing the notes be also paid out of the same fund, thus giving to Mr. Edwards the use and enjoyment of his official salary during his extreme illness and necessity.

Your committee therefore recommend that the said resolution be amended as follows: After the word "House," in line 9, insert the words "not to extend, however, beyond this present session of Congress;" also after the word "Edwards," in line 10, insert the words "while he shall be so employed and;" also after the word "assistants," in lines 11 and 12, insert the words "to transcribe his stenographic notes at the usual rates paid heretofore for such service," and that as amended the resolution be adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not see the necessity for the adoption of this resolution; and would like to have some explanation from the gentleman presenting it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. If the House will be in order the Chair will cause the resolution to be again read as it will appear if amended as proposed.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there is a mistake in the recital part of that resolution. It seems from the report that the Speaker did not employ this assistant to take the place of Mr. Edwards, but that he was employed by Mr. Edwards himself.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. Upon the application of Mr. Edwards the Chair gave him leave of absence during his sickness, and approved of his employment of Mr. Easton.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the resolution ought to show that the appointment of a substitute was made by Mr. Edwards himself, and not by the Speaker; because the Speaker, as I understand it, has no authority to make such appointments. The number of the Official Reporters authorized by law had been already appointed, and until there is a vacancy, caused by death or resignation, the Speaker has no authority to appoint any additional member of that corps.

This gentleman has been acting at the request or by employment of Mr. Edwards, therefore, and not by appointment of the Speaker.

But it seems, Mr. Speaker, that we have no necessity for this employment at all, in view of the fact that there are two stenographers already authorized by law in the employ of the House, now receiving annual salaries, whose duty it is to report the proceedings of the committees of the House when called upon. I know of no committees now in session that require their services, so that I can see no reason why one of them at least, and possibly both, may not be assigned to the duty of assisting the Official Reporters of debates on the floor of the House. I say I believe there is no committee now in session requiring their services. Perhaps the Committee on Manufactures may hold sessions occasionally; but I do not see why these stenographers should not be assigned to this duty.

I am satisfied that the House stenographers are in need of additional assistance, that they are very hard-worked, and especially by reason of the numerous night sessions we have had of late, and I am perfectly willing to give them all the additional assistance possible in view of the sickness of Mr. Edwards. But it seems to me that we have the necessary force already in the employ of the House, who are not doing any service for the committees.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. The Committee on the Library is also investigating a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. And if they are not employed in committees they could be used in connection with the work in the House, without the necessity of employing outside assistance.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, in order that the action of the Committee on Accounts may be clearly understood, it is well that I should state the reasons which induced the committee to recommend this resolution. Mr. Edwards, as is well known, is one of the regular Official Reporters of debates of the House. He was taken violently ill during the session of the House, and the presumption is, from his present condition, that he will not recover. In order that he might be able to retain his place and not lose his situation, being a man in such circumstances in life that it was necessary for him to work to obtain a living for himself and his family, and being ill, as I have stated, it became necessary for him to get some competent person to supply his place as one of the Reporters, so that his position may not be declared vacant and another appointment made. He did so, but it required the full amount of his legal salary to get a competent substitute, in addition to which it was necessary for him to employ other persons to assist this stenographer in order to transcribe his stenographic notes. He therefore not only pays the full amount of his salary, but has also been paying for this additional work.

Now, a person having a regular annual employment can afford to do that, although he may have only $2, $3, or $4 a day out of his salary during the session of Congress left after paying his necessary clerical assistance, for when Congress is not in session he gets his full salary, and in that manner he is able to even up and make a fair compensation. But the man who is employed as an assistant to work only thirty, sixty, or ninety days, as the case may be, can not afford, at least no stenographer who is capable of doing the work required to be done on the floor of the House, to accept the position for the meager amount that would be left him after paying these assistants. It required, therefore, the full amount of Mr. Edwards's salary to pay for his substitute, and in addition to that, to pay the additional compensation to persons for transcribing the notes of the stenographer, so that besides paying his full salary for the employment of a substitute, which he has been doing ever since the 11th day of June, he has also been paying in addition thereto from $8 to $10 a day to employ assistants. This man in the delirium of his fever is fretting over it, and it renders his condition a great deal worse.

It seems to me that where a faithful employé of the House has been, as this report shows, presumably stricken down in the service of the House, the House owes it to itself and to a spirit of fair treatment to its employés, that he shall not be left to bear, not only the burden of his illness, but the additional expense imposed upon him by this arrangement.

Mr. MCKINNEY. That is right.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. That is the explanation, and that is the reason the committee asks the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman if that has been the custom hitherto in such cases?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I do not know. I know of no other case of the kind.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the gentleman will find upon examination that such has not been the case.

Mr. MASON. Has there been any other case where a substitute has been employed for one of the Reporters who was sick?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I only know that it is consistent with an honorable and fair treatment of the employés of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman from Illinois had known of the conditions heretofore, he would not have asked the question. The same question has arisen heretofore, and it is proper for the House now to understand this new proceeding before adopting this resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

It is proposed to strike out, in the third, fourth, and fifth lines—

Now acting under the appointment of the Speaker as a substitute Reporter for J. K. Edwards.

And insert:

Who has been employed by Mr. Edwards.

So that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That Edward D. Easton, who has been employed by Mr. Edwards, who is confined to his bed by severe illness, etc.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I will accept that.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] intimates that there is an established rule in regard to this matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The custom heretofore has been that the stenographer who is sick, and whose salary runs on when he is sick as well as when he is well, designates some one to take his place. That, of course, is done by the acquiescence at least of the House, although the substitute is paid by the Reporter, who makes such private arrangement as he sees fit with a man who is acceptable to the House.

Mr. MASON. I am informed by the Reporters that this question has never been raised before.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. It seems to me the claimed precedent is hardly in point. Here is a case where the sickness has lasted from the 11th of June to the present time, with the probability of a fatal termination.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In the Forty-seventh Congress the illness continued to the death of the Reporter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER's amendment was agreed to; and the amendments of the committee as amended were agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOOKER. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to say that this gentleman has been a long and faithful servant of the House, and I think his salary ought to go on.

The motion to recommit was lost.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Now I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 38.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum. I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN].

Before the tellers took their places the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There is so much confusion in the House that some of us have been unable to know the exact matter under consideration. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is this resolution susceptible of a division, so that we can vote upon the payment for the services that this gentleman has rendered up to date, and by another vote determine whether he shall be paid for the future?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution is not susceptible of division. The resolution is so drawn that it can not be divided, in the opinion of the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It has been read twice.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 84, not voting 138; as follows:

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. McMILLIN said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote, being paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I also ask unanimous consent that my vote on the preceding yea-and-nay vote on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] be withdrawn, as I voted then under the impression that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was paired with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], but have since learned that it was not so.

There was no objection.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I have voted on this call because my former pair with the gentleman from West Virginia is withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. BOOTHMAN, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, with Mr. BURNETT, until Monday next at 3 o'clock.

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. O'DONNELL, for to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. PETERS, for to-day.

Mr. RICE with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, on this vote.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. HOPKINS, of New York, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. McMILLIN with Mr. BURROWS, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. FELTON, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOOTHMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the tariff bill, I wish, if possible, to come to some understanding with the other side as to the time when a vote shall be taken upon the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the debate had better continue for the remainder of this afternoon. I think there are enough gentlemen present who desire to speak to occupy that time, and on Monday morning we can probably come to some understanding as to when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. McMILLIN. Can we agree to take the vote at some hour on Monday?

Mr. REED. I would not like to make any agreement to-day. Let us go on this afternoon and see what progress we can make, and I think that on Monday morning we shall be able to tell just about where we stand.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to continuing the discussion for the remainder of to-day if we can make some agreement as to the time when the vote shall be taken, and I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we agree to take the vote at 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. REED. I think we had better let that matter go over until Monday morning.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who desires to introduce a bill.

WASHINGTON AND GREAT FALLS NARROW-GAUGE RAILROAD.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced by request a bill (H. R. 10830) to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Narrow-Gauge Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANK OF PORT JERVIS, N. Y.

Mr. BACON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10831) to authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to issue to the National Bank of Port Jervis, N. Y., currency in lieu of certain unsigned bills stolen from said bank; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-BOAT, OYSTER BED SHOALS, NEW YORK.

Mr. BACON also introduced a bill (H. R. 10832) for the establishment of a light-boat with fog-bell on Oyster Bed Shoals, in the Hudson River, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make be allowed to file them with the Clerk in the usual manner.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being laid upon the Clerk's desk:

MILITIA OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McADOO, from the Committee on the Militia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2602) concerning the militia of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BIRMINGHAM, MOBILE AND NAVY COVE HARBOR RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT AND CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVERS.

Mr. CLARDY also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10538) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORT OF PORTLAND.

Mr. CLARDY also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 24) to extend the limits of the port of Portland as a port of entry; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FOURTH COLLECTION DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. CLARDY also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2613) to amend an act approved June 15, 1882, changing the boundaries of the fourth collection district of Virginia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB CAPES.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Capes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

STANLEY J. MORROW.

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7993) for the relief of Stanley J. Morrow; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ISAAC FIELDHOUSE.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 8153) for the relief of Isaac Fieldhouse; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF MIGUEL DESMARAIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 8160) for the relief of the legal representatives of Miguel Desmarais and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. T. AND C. T. HALETT.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 7781) for the relief of J. T. and C. T. Halett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RAFAEL ROMERO.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 8161) for the relief of Rafael Romero; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MANUEL SILVA.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 6361) for the relief of Manuel Silva; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORTS OF ENTRY AT TACOMA AND SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1128) to create ports of entry at Tacoma and Seattle, in Washington Territory; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB NEWHARD.

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4855) granting a pension to Jacob Newhard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2662) for the erection of a public building at Salt Lake City, Utah; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JESSE DURNELL.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 9211) for the relief of Jesse Durnell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL HEIN.

Mr. MASON also, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4087) for the relief of Samuel Hein; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOSEPH KULAGE, DECEASED.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 2564) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Kulage, deceased; which was laid on the table.

He also reported from the same committee, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 10833) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Kulage, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon striking out section 3 of this bill. During this day formal amendments need not be offered, as the debate will be continued on the pending amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a brief editorial from the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE ABOLITION OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

The venerable Judge KELLEY seems to have stirred up a good-sized hornets' nest by his unequivocal avowal on the floor of Congress of opposition to the retention of the internal-revenue system. The Republican platform was for cutting off everything except whisky, and even that rather than weaken the protective system. The convention contemplated the total repeal of internal taxation as probable in the near future; Judge KELLEY agrees with the Inter-Ocean that the time has already come for getting rid of that war tax. For taking that position he is charged with willingness to promote intemperance in the interest of protected industries. In proof of this charge a remark made by Mr. Blaine in his Paris interview is often quoted. It is true that Mr. Blaine thinks, or did six months ago, that the moral argument was in favor of retaining the tax, but the Prohibition party, which has given the subject special consideration and ought to be accepted as the highest authority on that point, holds just the contrary opinion. The fourth plank of the platform adopted at the national Prohibition convention, at Indianapolis, six weeks ago, declares for "the immediate abolition of the internal-revenue system, whereby our national Government is deriving support from our greatest national vice."

If the objection urged to the Republican position on this subject were well taken it would equally apply to the Prohibition position. The two differ in extent; they also approach each other from different starting points, but if the Republicans are chargeable with favoring "free whisky," then so are the Prohibitionists, only more so. The truth is that it takes both planks to suggest the whole truth of the matter. There are two great arguments in favor of the proposed repeal, one financial and one ethical. It is alike for the pecuniary and the moral interest of the American people that the internal-revenue system should be abolished. On the latter point there is no room for fair controversy. Of course, each individual reasoner has a right to his own personal opinion, but when it comes to an authoritative declaration it must be conceded that a national and representative gathering of Prohibitionists is the highest possible authority upon the moral or temperance phase of the tax on whisky. What could be more absurd than to charge the Republican party with promoting the liquor interest when it takes a step toward the position occupied by the Prohibition party? That touches the utmost verge, the outer rim of the preposterous.

The pretension that the removal of the tax on whisky would make it dangerously cheap is based on the assumption that the State authorities could not or would not subject the liquor traffic to special treatment, when the fact is that everywhere the traffic is either prohibited, except for medical and mechanical purposes, or required to pay special license fees. There is no such thing as "free whisky" anywhere in the United States, independent of the national tax. Of course the prohibition and the license laws are often evaded and contemned, but such violation would not be increased or aggravated by removing the national tax. On the contrary, the latter has created and maintains a whisky ring which is one of the great hindrances to the enforcement of temperance legislation. The enormous fund at the command of the liquor trust is largely due to the machinery of national taxation, and it is only natural that the Prohibitionists, who find their work constantly impeded by the whisky ring with its millions, should demand the immediate abolition of the internal-revenue system.

The enemies of the Republican party who prate so loudly of "free whisky" should know that the trick they are trying to play will not work. If the election were to come off in August it might, but long before November the bottom will fall out of the hypocritical sham, and the mischief will react. Judging from the developments up to date, the Republican party is to be assailed this time with platform lies rather than with personal abuse of the standard-bearer. Perhaps the latter will come out later on the Morey letter plan. However that may be, the first duty of the citizen is to form an intelligent idea of each plank in the platform, especially this most assailed one pledging the party to conditional abolition of the internal-revenue system. To be cordially approved by all who approve the policy of protection and of lessening the evils of intemperance it needs only to be clearly understood.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to the subject under discussion I make the ordinary request, that my time be not limited to the usual five minutes, but that I be permitted to continue for not exceeding thirty minutes, though I do not think I shall occupy more than half that time.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] be allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, in view of the attempt that is being made to fix an early hour for a vote upon this paragraph, and in view of the fact that there are several gentlemen on this side who desire to speak, I think that perhaps speeches ought to be limited to some less time than thirty minutes. I do not want to interpose an objection to the motion just made; but if my colleague from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] will be satisfied with twenty minutes, I think that will meet with general approval.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] that very few speeches have been made on this side of the House on this question.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I withdraw my suggestion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio on the left of the Chair [Mr. GROSVENOR] also asks to be allowed thirty minutes, and if there be no objection consent will be given that each of the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE and Mr. GROSVENOR] shall be allowed that time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman who is to follow me [Mr. GROSVENOR] has not preceded me in this discussion. We have reached that part of the bill which provides for placing raw wool upon the free list and reducing correspondingly the duty upon goods manufactured from wool. As my colleagues upon that side of the House with great unanimity insist upon retaining this duty upon wool and the higher duty upon woolens, I should have been glad to have heard from the gentleman his reasons for their position other than political reasons.

Will placing wool upon the free-list affect injuriously the interests of the men engaged in the sheep-raising industry? Listening to many of the speeches made against this step will not bring one to the conclusion that such a result must follow such legislative action. Will it benefit such interests? If I had serious doubts upon this question I might attempt to prevent what is proposed in this section of the bill. We must consider whether the proposed reduction in the wool and woolens schedule will injure either industry; but we can not help seeing that it will result in lower-priced clothing. Every wearer of garments made of wool—and who is not in this broad land?—may expect increased comfort as a direct result. The tax paid last year upon wool and woolen goods was $35,646,497.63. How much was the additional tribute paid upon them to the favored manufacturers.

The gentleman from the Eighth district of Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY] occupied some time when this subject was last under consideration in discussing this section of the bill. I listened with fixed attention to hear what he would say, during some forty minutes of time, in favor of the position occupied by the Republican members of Ohio upon this important question. I followed him closely all through; and it has been a long time since I have heard so thoroughly exhaustive and exhausting, so profound and so comprehensive a consideration of a topic under discussion in this House as that of which he gave us the benefit. It reminded me of a lecture that I attended in my youth, delivered by the celebrated Artemas Ward. The title of the lecture was "Sixty minutes in Africa." The audience listened to the lecturer with wrapt attention for fifty-nine and a half minutes while he wandered all over the universe, touching upon every remote subject that his mind could reach, and then closed with this allusion to the subject of the lecture: "Africa; Africa is noted for the strong fragrance of the rose found there in great abundance—the negroes."

Now, my colleague kept to his subject about as thoroughly as did that lecturer. I attempted by what might have been considered a flippant and impertinent inquiry to interject into his remarks something concerning sheep or wool; but I see that the gentleman has exercised his privilege of revising me entirely out of the RECORD, and thereby revising out of his speech the only allusion to wool that might have been found in it.

Gentlemen upon the other side have insisted upon certain propositions as being good reasons why the duty should be retained upon wool. One of those propositions is that the tariff has increased the number of sheep in this country abnormally; another that the tariff has increased the clip of wool.

How they do fire off statistics to sustain these assertions! There were so many sheep in such a year, and there were so many more in such another later year. There was a high tariff on wool during this period; therefore the tariff produced more sheep and the sheep produced more wool. Yes, indeed; and each sheep grew more wool and better wool because of this tariff. How many such arguments we hear!

The gentleman from Maine insists that in the twenty years between 1860 and 1880 the tariff has increased the number of sheep some 80 per cent., and the wool-clip 300 per cent. Another gentleman, one of my colleagues from Ohio, has insisted, and has produced a table here, drawn from the statistics of our country, to show that the increase of sheep in Ohio for the four years beginning with 1879 was, by the natural effect of the tariff, to use his own language, 863,659 sheep, and of wool 5,677,689 pounds.

Thus demonstrating the natural effect of the tariff of 1857 to have been the increase of the flocks on the one hand, and a large increase of wool on the other

Now, I had supposed that the natural fecundity of the flocks has something to do with this increase. I supposed that instead of the tariff being a sort of providential prolific projector of sheep into this country, nature had something to do with their increase, and the shepherd with his care and protection had made the most of it.

I have examined the Statistical Abstract of the United States, published in 1887, to see how nature, supplemented by the care and concern of man, has dealt with other domestic animals—to see whether sheep were the only domestic animals that in this period of time have increased so rapidly in number. In the first place, I find by the Statistical Abstract, page 251, that from 1866 to 1886, the twenty years immediately previous to the enactment of the high wool tariff, the increase of sheep reached 50 per cent. Next I look in the same table in another column at the number of milch cows, and I find that in the same period of time the increase was 150 per cent.

Now, I expect some ardent advocate of the protective theory to rise up and say that the cows increased because of the protective tariff on cheese and butter [laughter]; so I will draw no inference from that item. I next take the number of horses, and find that in the same period they increased over 200 per cent. It may be that some ardent and enthusiastic protectionist will say that this was because of the tariff on curled hair. [Laughter.] The next topic in this table to which I call attention is the number of swine, which increased in this same twenty years of time nearly 250 per cent.; but then there is the tariff on bristles to account for that. [Laughter.] The next item I take is the number of oxen, which increased 350 per cent. in the same period; but then there was a tariff on hides and tariff on tallow, and of course that was the cause of the increase in this class of domestic animals.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is not any duty on hides.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There was a tariff during a part of the time—up to 1872; and the increase was about as rapid during the period that the tariff was in force as it has been since it was taken off.

But here is a domestic animal that beats all the rest, and it is entirely unprotected. I find that in this period of time mules increased 800 per cent., and there is no protective duty on this class of domestic animals—neither upon its hair nor its hide.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That increase was owing——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am not paired with the gentleman to-day, politically or otherwise, and I have not time to be interrupted.

I want to call attention now to statistics in regard to raw cotton. In this same period of time raw cotton increased 200 per cent. Yet there was no duty on raw cotton.

I think the citation of these examples may possibly reflect some light upon the proposition that it was the tariff alone has produced the increase in the number of sheep in this country. But lest I may be taken up on that, I call attention to the increase of sheep and the increase of the wool clip during nearly the same period in countries which are entirely free-trade. I have here the volume issued by the Treasury Department concerning wool and manufactures of wool—a special report on that subject—and I find on the forty-fifth page some statistics in reference to this article. In India in 1859 there were only 14,000,000 pounds of wool raised; but in 1880 there were 50,000,000 pounds raised—an increase of over 250 per cent. There was no tariff there to account for that. Take next the African colonies; in 1859 there were 14,000,000 pounds raised; in 1880, 46,000,000 pounds, an increase of quite 225 per cent. Did any tariff make this increase? There was none.

Without any tariff whatever upon wool, Australia in 1860 raised 55,000,000 pounds; in 1880, 392,000,000 pounds, an increase of over 600 per cent. and twice as much as in this country with its protective tariff. This immense wool crop was from 51,000,000 sheep, making the average nearly 8 pounds per fleece.

If the tariff is the producer of our increased growth of wool, please account to me for the increase in these countries—the number of sheep, amount of wool, and weight per fleece. While I am upon this topic I wish to cite the great increase throughout the world in the production of wool as evidence that the price of wool is influenced by supply and demand.

My colleague [Mr. BOOTHMAN] introduced a table to show the decrease in Ohio for four years following 1883—the result, as he argued, of the reduction of the tariff made at the beginning of that period by the Republican party. By his table he shows that in the four years following that reduction of the tariff there was a falling off of 1,019,049 in the number of sheep, and in the quantity of wool 7,704,073 pounds. That is very plausible upon its face. It looks as if the falling off might be attributed to the reduction of the tariff. But I have here a similar table prepared by an active and energetic journalist in the State of Ohio, drawing his data from exactly the same source. It is with regard to the effect—if tariffs have any effect upon this question—of the high tariff of 1867 upon the number of these animals reared in our State.

I will insert the table and some comments of the gentleman who made it in my speech:

Years.	Sheep.	Wool.	Years.	Sheep.	Wool.
	Number.	Pounds.		Number.	Pounds.
1867	7,595,507	24,848,629	1883	5,130,920	24,349,109
1868	7,688,845	22,940,479	1884	4,968,794	23,558,713
1869	6,272,640	19,292,858	1885	4,928,232	22,081,522
1870	5,652,028	16,711,521	1886	4,272,463	22,161,358

Result.	Sheep.	Wool.
	Number.	Pounds.
Decrease in 1870 from 1867	2,503,479	8,137,108
Decrease in 1886 from 1883	858,457	2,187,751

The tariff was placed on wool in 1867; 5 per cent. of it was removed in 1883. Now, if the removal of 5 per cent. caused a decrease of 858,457 sheep and 2,187,751 pounds of wool in four years from 1883 to 1886, will Mr. Cowden be kind enough to tell me what caused a decrease of 2,503,479 sheep and 8,127,108 pounds of wool in the four years from 1867 to 1870?

W. A. TAYLOR.

There was a decrease in four years after the tariff of 1867 was put on wool of 2,503,479 sheep in the State of Ohio. Please tell me why, if the taking off of the tariff diminishes the number of sheep, the putting on of tariff does not increase instead of diminish the number?

Mr. WILKINS. Permit me to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Answer in your own time.

Mr. WILKINS. One million and a half of sheep were driven into Texas that year.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is not an answer to my question and is a statement which is unfounded so far as the statistics are concerned. There was a falling off in the Ohio wool clip of over 8,837,808 pounds in four years after putting on a high tariff, or a falling off of nearly four times the amount shown to have been the falling off in four years after the reduction of that tariff.

Suppose the statement of my friend to be absolutely correct. Even suppose that a like ratio of all the sheep of the United States were driven into Texas, would that account for the fact that there was a diminution of 7,534,382 sheep in the United States in four years after 1867. There was also a diminution of 18,000,000 pounds in the annual clip within four years after this increase of tariff on wool in 1867. What inference in favor of a restoration of that tariff do gentlemen across the aisle draw from these facts?

I have here a pamphlet which is entitled, "Facts about wool and woolens," sent to me by some zealous Republican protectionist in order that I may read, learn, and digest its contents, so as to vote intelligently on the subject; because you know I belong to those ignorant, blundering Democrats that Mr. INGALLS'S candidate for the Vice-Presidency alluded to on the floor of the House the other day.

This pamphlet is written by Dr. E. P. Miller, author of the "Fallacies of free-trade," "Protection the farmers' only security," and several works on medical topics. Just see whether he mixes up his quackery on medicine with his quackery on the wool question. [Laughter and applause.]

Here is a table containing a statement of prices of unwashed wool in New York and Philadelphia markets from 1824 to 1887. I have on the opposite side a table of changes made in the tariff law. The two tables show on inspection, first, that the price of wool went up after reductions of duties quite as often as it went up after an increase, and in the second place, the price went down after increase of duties as often as it went up after an increase. There is another proposition contained in these figures.

I take from the table the average price of fine wool for the month of January during the ten years immediately preceding the high tariff, and the average price in the month of January was 63.8 cents per pound. Taking from this table the average price in the same month during the first ten years immediately following the high tariff of 1867 and the price fell to 56.2 cents per pound. I am making all these comparisons of the prices of fine wool.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the tariff is not added to the price of the wool?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am giving you some protection Republican authority upon the effect that a tariff has on the prices of wool. Take the second decade, when the high tariff was still on, and the average price for that period fell to 41.4 cents during the month of January, being 22 cents less in the ten tariff years than for the ten years of low tariff. Six years of the period which I have designated as the second decade of high tariff were before the reduction of 1883. In fact, as I am comparing January prices, seven of the ten before that reduction are included in the sum to make the average. I wish to be fair in these comparisons.

But some one may say that it is not fair to compare the prices during the ten years from 1857 to 1866, inclusive, with the prices during the ten years from 1867 to 1876, inclusive; you ought not to take a period of national and financial disturbance, but a period when there was no such disturbance. Very well, then, let us take the low-tariff period from 1850 to 1860, during six years of which the duty was 30 per cent. and for the other four no duty. In the October market of these ten years the average price of fine wool was 51.4. To get away from the inflation period as far as I can I will take from 1877 to 1886, inclusive. Calculating the average price of fine wool, October market, I find it was 39.7 cents per pound.

During the first six years of this last period the duties were 90 per cent. of the highest ever known, being from 45 to 55 per cent., and during the other four years the duties ranged from 40 to 50 per cent. The average duties for these ten years were about four times the average duties for the ten years with which I have just compared the average prices of fine wools as shown by the table. But I am not left to the deductions which I may make from these figures. On December 17, 1869, twenty months after the high-tariff act had gone into effect, a Republican Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Republican Congress then in session a document prepared by a Republican special commissioner of revenue, from which I wish to read some extracts. They give the conclusions of this commissioner as to the effect of the passage of that act. They are as follows:

Nearly two years have now elapsed since these measures were consummated, giving ample time for experience to test the principle. And what to-day is that experience?

First. Wool to the agriculturist at a lower price in gold than has almost ever before been experienced, the average price of medium American washed wools from 1827 to 1862 having been 42.8 cents per pound (gold), while the average price of Ohio wools for the year 1868, reduced to gold, was only 35.21 cents, which is less than the average price of 1858, when, under the influence of the disastrous crisis of 1857, a large portion of the mills of the country were standing absolutely idle. For the year 1869 the price paid in Ohio for medium wools has been about 43 cents currency (32½ cents gold).

Second. A decrease of the number of sheep in the United States, estimated by the Commissioner of Agriculture at 4,000,000 for the single year 1868, while other authorities place the total decrease as high as 25 per cent. since the passage of the wool tariff.

Third. A condition of the woolen manufacture characterized by a greater depression than that of any other branch of industry in the country with the exception of ship-building; small profits accruing to a few, heavy losses to the many, with numerous and constantly recurring failures.

Fourth. An increase in the importation of foreign fabrics of wool; the imports for the fiscal year 1868 being returned at $32,458,834, and for 1869 at $34,620,943.

Gentleman protectionists now question all this and shout out: Explain! Explain! I can give no better explanation than this same commissioner gave. Satisfied with his statement, and adopting it, I quote it here:

The manner in which the present extravagant duties on the importation of foreign wools operate to prevent the prosperity and extension of the domestic woolen manufacturing industry, and to reduce the price of domestic wool, is a matter not difficult of explanation.

The wools of the United States are mainly the merino clothing wools, which can be produced in any quantity and at prices which defy foreign competition. Wool has been raised in Texas during the last year (1868–'69) in large quantities at an estimated cost of 7 cents (gold) per pound, and has commanded readily in the market 25 cents (gold) per pound. It is furthermore to be noted that German-Saxon wool, which during the last year has touched the lowest price almost of the century, could not now be imported, even in the absence of all duty, and sold at so low a price as the average prices which XX Ohio wools have commanded during the past season in the New York market.

On the other hand, wools which the existing tariff excludes are mainly wools which are either not grown in the United States or grown in very limited and insufficient quantities. The American manufacturer, therefore, being restricted in the selection of his raw material, is, of necessity, restricted in the variety of his products; and the great quantity of machinery brought into existence by the demands of the war has in consequence been forced, in great part, into one line of production; overstocking the markets with certain descriptions of fabrics, unnaturally reducing prices, restricting diversity and extension of production, and bringing disaster upon the whole business of wool manufacturing.

I shall now return to the pamphlet of Dr. E. P. Miller for further statistics and arguments in favor of free raw wool. Understand clearly that he had no intention that his production should be put to such base uses. I shall now use the language of this gentleman who proposes to instruct us how to vote.

The reader will remember that the first duty placed on wool in this country was in the year 1824, after thirty-five years of free wool. The price of fine wool in January of that year, it will be noticed, was 68 cents; in April, 70 cents; in July, 55 cents; in October, 60 cents. Now notice the price in 1887, after twenty years of high tariff; in January, 33 cents; in April, 33 cents; in July, 34 cents; in October, 35 cents. Show a decline in the month of January of 35 cents a pound; in April, of 37 cents; in July, 21 cents; in October, 25 cents; or an average decline throughout the year of 29½ cents a pound.

That is a pretty picture to hold out to the wool-growing farmers of Ohio to induce them to vote to keep the tariff on wool. In view of it can you wonder that they no longer desire the restoration of the tariff of 1867? But I must read on. The doctor says with emphasis:

Fine wool sold in the New York and Philadelphia markets after thirty-five years of free wool on an average of 29½ cents more per pound than it did in the same markets after twenty years of high tariff duties.

Are we to go on in this downward course? The wool-growing industry of my State is declining under the baleful influence of the present high tariff. Shall we make no effort to arrest that decline? But here is another paragraph, and it is drawn, too, correctly, from the tables, which I have compared to see whether he has been juggling with the figures or not:

Another fact. In 1866, the year before the highest tariff was placed upon wool, fine wool in January was 70 cents per pound, in April 65 cents, in July 70 cents, in October 63 cents.

Mr. DORSEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have but a few moments. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. DORSEY. I only want to ask what was the price of gold at that time?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman can take his own time to answer his questions—while in January, 1884, the year of the highest production on wool in this country, seventeen years after the highest duties known in the history of the country, fine wool sold at 40 cents in January, 48 cents in April, 35 cents in July, and 35 cents in October. This shows an average decline in price of 27½ cents a pound since the adoption of the highest duties.

The gentleman has interrupted me to intimate that this decline is attributable to the fall in the price of gold and that the tariff on wool has sustained the price of wool; that the farmers know these things to be true.

If these be facts, the farmers of my district do not know them to be, but deny both propositions. The decline is still going on, and they want to stop the decline, if possible, by legislation.

A MEMBER. How are you going to stop it?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not know whether it is possible or not; I do not think it is possible to do so by increasing the tariff. Is not the increased supply throughout the country and the world bringing the price down? But I am quoting a Republican as authority now, and though I do not agree with him in all his conclusions, I do agree with him as to his facts. He says:

Another important fact should be observed, while the price of fine wool, on which the highest duties were placed, had declined an average of 29½ cents a pound from the year 1824 to 1887, the price of coarse wool, on which the lowest duties were placed, had advanced 4 cents a pound.

The duties then do make a distinction as against the finer qualities and in favor of the coarse. Well, in Ohio we take pride in raising the very finest wool that is produced in the United States.

Again, in January, 1866, before the highest duties were placed upon wool, the difference in price between fine wool, upon which we had highest duties, and coarse wool, on which were placed the lowest duties, was 20 cents a pound.

That is coming down a little nearer to the region of the present time, and here he reaches it.

While in January, 1887, fine and coarse wool sold at the same price, and in July of the same year coarse wool sold at 1 cent a pound higher than fine wool.

Again this gentleman has a paragraph in this pamphlet which he heads "Free wool does not lessen the cost to the consumer;" in other words, free wool does not lessen the price to the manufacturer; in other words, free wool does not lessen the price that the farmer receives, and he proves it by figures from the same table.

In 1853 wool under 8 cents a pound was admitted free of duty; the price of fine wool in January of that year was 55 cents a pound; while in January, 1834, it was 70 cents, a rise of 15 cents per pound; the price of coarse wool in January, 1833, was 33 cents a pound; in April it was 38 cents; in July, 40; in October, 45, and in January, 1834, it was 48 cents a pound, showing an advance of 15 cents a pound in one year after putting wool on the free-list.

Again, in 1857, when wool valued at 20 cents a pound or less was put upon the free-list, although it fell off a little in 1858, it was 2 cents a pound higher in January, 1859, than in January, 1857. Do not the facts prove clearly that putting wool on the free-list does not lessen the cost to the consumer, as claimed by the opponents of protection? And if the price of wool advanced after it was made free, as it did in these cases, how are consumers in this country benefited by free wool?

These facts certainly sustain the heading of the paragraph. What interest has the wool-grower in keeping on the tariff or increasing it in the face of such proofs that it would not injure him to have free wool? But my protectionist advocate gives other reasons. Of course he never intended these arguments to be studied by wool-growers. They were for the manufacturers' friends here.

I will now read another paragraph, which he heads "The price of wool is not raised by increasing the duties;" and I commend this to my friend from Ohio, who wants the duty of 67 cents restored.

In 1824, after thirty-five years of free wool, the price of fine wool in January was 68 cents, and in April, 70 cents a pound. In May of that year a tariff of 15 and 20 per cent. was placed on wool, but the price instead of going up went down, for fine wool sold in July at 55 cents; in October, at 60 cents; in January, 1826, at 55 cents, and in January, 1827, at 35 cents. Again, in 1842, after ten years of nearly free wool, a tariff was placed on low-priced wool, and in January of that year fine wool was sold at 48 cents, and coarse at 35 cents; in January, 1843, fine at 35 cents and coarse at 25 cents per pound.

* * * * * * *

After the tariff act of March, 1867, the highest in the history of the country, the price of wool declined instead of advancing, for it sold in January, 1866, at 70 cents; in January, 1867, at 68 cents; in April, at 60; in July, at 55; in October, at 48; and in January, 1868, at 48 cents a pound; in April, at 50; in July, at 46, and in October, at 48, a decline in one year of 20 cents a pound.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Whose speech is the gentleman quoting from?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am not quoting from a speech, but from a pamphlet.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I really have not time.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It is a very short question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I prefer not to yield the little time I have.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Under those figures and under your statement, do you think, applied to wool, that the tariff is a tax?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Do I think the tariff is a tax? Yes; I think it is, and I now propose to show from good Republican authority that it is a tax; not using the word tax at all.

I read now from the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], which, I think, will confirm the statement I have just made, and I quote from page 6757 of the RECORD:

Nothing can be clearer than if wool is admitted free of duty, it will result in a decline of wool nearly to the extent of the duty.

That is a proposition that I commend to the attention of gentlemen on the other side, "that it will result in a decline in wool nearly equal to the extent of the duty." You accept the proposition of the gentleman from Maine and indorse it. You believe it to be true. And not only that, but that the woolens the people wear will decline correspondingly. I accept the latter as a necessary result of free wool and will give my reasons further on. If imported wools are reduced in price it does not follow that the price of fine domestic wools must be also reduced.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman does not want, I am sure, to do me an injustice by quoting only one-half of the remark.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly not. I am not going to do the gentleman any injustice. I am going to give the gentleman the benefit of his own remarks; but I am simply commenting upon it as I go along, as I have something to say myself in this connection. That is a clear, plain statement, the proposition that to reduce foreign wools to the manufacturers equal nearly to the extent of the duty necessarily will reduce woolens to the people.

We have in Ohio a very intelligent gentleman. I know that he is an intelligent gentleman, because he once represented his district in Congress as a Republican, and that ought to be a sufficient indorsement for him upon the floor of this House, who is a sheep-raiser and has a flock of 200 head or more, and I heard him say not long ago that he would give all the benefits he now receives upon the whole wool-clip of his flock by the protective tariff for the privilege of buying one untaxed pair of pantaloons.

Now, I will go on with the statement of the gentleman from Maine. He says:

But after this decline has wrecked wool-growing in this country and one-sixth of the production of the world has been lost—

Mark, you, Mr. Chairman, every industry that is touched by the bill is going to be wrecked and ruined; and the sheep, according to one gentleman who spoke the other day, are to be driven out of the country; and according to another gentleman nothing but annihilation and destruction will result to the wool industry of the country. It will be crushed out, he said upon this floor the other day. I was threatened with the loss of the wool vote in my district if I had agreed to stand by this section of the bill.

In my district there is one very excelleat precinct. It is a precinct that is known by the name of Goosetown. At the late primaries I was most thoroughly indorsed and supported in that classic precinct, and it was reported that the next morning in the police court appeared several of my constituents from Goosetown, some with discolored cuticle around the eyes and others with noses slightly swollen. But they had fought like brave men long and well, and I had hoped they would be there in November to fight my battle as valiantly again, if need be.

What am I to do now? According to the gentleman from New Jersey I am oath-bound to support this bill; and I find, to my horror and dismay, that this bill to which I am thus pledged puts feathers on the free-list, and will crush, destroy, annihilate, and totally wreck the goose industry of Goosetown in my district. [Laughter.] How many of you gentlemen do actually believe that taking the tariff off of wool will destroy the wool industry? How many believe that I am oath-bound to vote for this bill or any line of it?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say he is pledged to support that bill?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I referred to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. PHELPS).

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Sworn to according to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. "Imposed an oath upon every one of them" was the language he used. I am not mistaken. Let me go on with this little dissertation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The proposition is ridiculous that it, the bill, will destroy the wool-growing industry. It is an industry which pays very little for its labor, and in which the natural increase each year is from 75 to 80 per cent., and which has the additional value in the markets of being a meat-producing industry; that that industry will be destroyed by taking a little of the tax off imported wool, or even taking the whole of the tax off of such wool, is not to be believed.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen right here to the fact that there are countries upon the face of this globe that have no tariff upon wool, and that in those countries the industry is flourishing as well as it is in this country. They are scattered all over the world; and in some instances are doing better, according to the statistics that I read a few moments ago, than this country is so far as wool-growing is concerned. To read on from the gentleman's remarks:

But after this decline has wrecked wool-growing in this country and one-sixth of the production of the world has been lost does any one doubt that foreign wool-growers will take advantage of the situation to increase the price, so that the ultimate result will be greater cost of wool clothing?

When one-sixth of the world's wool-growing is lost.

Then we are to be destroyed! There is to be a grand combine. The Chinese are to come in upon us. People are to assemble in a monstrous wool trust from every civilized and uncivilized land. They are to come from the steppes of Asia and the colonies of Great Britain, whether in Australasia or Africa. They are to come from the heart of Russia. They are to come from the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, from Canada, and from the South Sea Islands; and all get together and combine to control an industry that produces nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds of wool, worth about $400,000,000 annually. Simply to call attention to it in this way is sufficient answer to the proposition.

My friend from Ohio stated that already the price of wool had gone down from fear of the Mills bill. "The reduction in price has been occasioned by the pendency and discussion of the Mills bill alone." Can it be that such an intelligent constituency as his would let the price of wool go down on account of the discussion of the Mills bill alone, when there sits the Republican Senate at the other end of the Capitol (as has often been boasted by gentlemen) ready to save this country from destruction? Perhaps they have no faith in that body. Perhaps politics does not control the price of wool; but the rule of supply and demand does.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As I have not talked on this subject in the general debate I ask to have five minutes longer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish my colleague, if he will permit me, would state his opinion as to the influence of a protective tariff upon the wool industry, giving the reasons for his opinion, and then stating whether he is in favor of or opposed to a protective system in its behalf.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That would simply cut off the rest of my remarks; and I have a particular speech in my mind that I want to finish.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the kind of speech that will bring an answer in the district.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will speak in the district this fall.

I have here some propositions similar to that of the gentleman's with regard to the destruction of the wool industry which I saw in a paper this morning; "that everybody in this country was alarmed except the foreign importers and the foreign shippers, because the duty of 15 cents is to be taken off potatoes." Everybody alarmed! My constituents in Goosetown are not alarmed. They rest from their labors. They are ready and willing to accept their potatoes at 15 cents a bushel less, if such be the effect. But the duty is not to be taken off. Then, here is another article which I cut out of an independent Republican paper this morning, a telegram stating that the iron industry in Hocking Valley in my district was about to be destroyed. Why? Because the Mills bill proposed to take $2 per ton off pig-iron. Is that so? I fail to see it in the Mills bill. The cut is only 72 cents per ton. The truthful and intelligent correspondent goes on to say that the coal industry is going to be destroyed. Why? "Because we are going to put coal on the free-list." Such false prophecies of evil are quite common. Nobody is influenced by them.

It is not for fear of loss to the farmer—it is not anxiety on account of the farmer that is prompting a great many gentlemen here in their opposition to this reduction.

The gentleman from Rhode Island expressed it very clearly in a colloquy between himself and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] the other day when he said that "the woolen manufacturers are afraid of free wool, because they are afraid of free woolens later on."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], says, on page 6757 of the RECORD:

But the passage of the Mills bill could not even temporarily benefit woolen manufacturers. The present tariff imposes on imported woolens a specific pound or square-yard duty, intended to fully cover and little more than cover the duty on wool, which goes to the farmer, and a manufacturer's duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem on coarse woolens and 40 per cent. on fine. The Mills bill abolishes the duty on wool and also the specific duty on imported woolens, leaving the manufacturer the same ad valorem duty as at present. This does not give the woolen manufacturer any additional vantage ground as against imported goods.

That is what troubles them, that we do not give the woolen manufacturers any additional vantage ground as against imported goods. They want additional vantage ground.

The gentleman says again:

In other words, the woolen manufacturer, with free wool and nothing but the manufacturer's ad valorem duty, which is largely overcome by undervaluations of imports, would not be so well off as now.

So far as the undervaluation of imports is concerned we have taken care of it in this bill. So far as any danger to the manufacturers is concerned, I do not believe that it exists. They have been able to take care of themselves. We have made a fair proposition, which is to make a reduction equivalent to the reduction which shall result from the taking off of the tariff on wool, that which they have paid heretofore on that part of their raw material which they imported.

I have here a little thing which I think shows the cause of the solicitude of gentlemen upon the other side of the House on behalf of the manufacturers at this time. It is from a paper called the Tariff League Bulletin, which professes to be "devoted to the protection of American labor and industries." On the first page of it there is a comment upon what it calls the "confidential letter of the Republican League of the United States," and here is what the editor says about that letter:

It would be useless to criticise the tone of this "sensational document," or the temper with which it assails American manufacturers, in words which it says "are strong and bitter, but they are true." And we will not here comment upon the unfortunate policy of the letter which enforces a peremptory demand for money with a threat.

It is important at this time only to review the charges against American manufacturers, which are the bone and sinew of this "confidential letter," without which it would receive from us no comment whatever. They are quoted, it is true, from an eminent Republican Senator, but they are quoted with approval and declared to be true.

These charges, when stripped of their discreditable verbiage, are, first, that the "campaign which we are about to enter will concern more than anybody else the manufacturers of the country"—"men who are getting practically the sole benefits, or at least the most directly important benefits, of the tariff laws;" and, second, "That while reaping the fruits of the tariff policy they have been very laggard in their contributions to the Republican cause." Their conduct is called "craveneal parsimony." The New England manufacturers, it is said, have been somewhat less parsimonious than the others. But of Pennsylvania manufacturers it says, in language both vigorous and picturesque:

"If I had my way about it I would put them under the fire and fry all the fat out of them."

And (he might have added) "hold my dripping-pan under them to catch this fat to make soap out of for W. W. Dudley to carry on the campaign with in Indiana." [Laughter.]

This editorial proceeds:

But while manufacturers derive no greater advantages from protection than other classes in proportion to the magnitude of their enterprises, they nevertheless do contribute far more than all other classes to its support. The records of the Republican party prove it. Those who have been engaged in collecting funds for its defense will testify to it.

Well, if the records of the Republican party prove it, of course the Republican party ought to serve those who employ it for that purpose.

The editor continues:

We therefore deny the assertion of the Senator whom the Republican League has chosen for its mouthpiece, and we affirm that more than three-fourths of all the money used in support of Republicanism and protection has come from men directly or indirectly engaged in manufactures.

Mr. Chairman, I want to close with these sentences: Any legislation that is purchased is vicious legislation. Any legislation that is bought with money, no matter what its purpose may be, is legislation that the people of the country should beware of. Any legislation which is in return for money paid to carry political campaigns with is injurious to the interests of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Do we understand from that that you are a free-trader?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not know what you understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask that my colleague's time be extended long enough for him to explain where he stands with reference to this industry. We do not know except inferentially.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. And in that connection I would like to have him answer whether he is a free-trader or not.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Of course if the gentleman does not want time to make the explanation——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You Republicans may call me a free-trader.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire to ask my colleague from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILKINS. I would like to ask my colleague whether he did not, with all the members of the Ohio delegation, go before the Ways and Means Committee of the Forty-ninth Congress and protest against the removal of the tariff duty on wool proposed by the Morrison bill, under consideration in that Congress? I hope he will answer yes or no.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There has been some progress since that time. I trust I have kept pace with it. I voted for the consideration of the Morrison bill without hesitation at the session to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. REED. We are willing to give the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] more time, as he has neglected to state his position.

Mr. WILKINS (to Mr. OUTHWAITE). Did you not sign a paper at that time——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has been recognized.

Mr. BLAND. Since that time the Representatives from Ohio have heard from their people. Some of them have been nominated with instructions on this wool question; and others rejected without instructions.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been recognized, and will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my remarks, I ask that I may be allowed time to conclude them without reference to the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks an extension of time to conclude his remarks.

A MEMBER. For what period?

Mr. CASWELL. As my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has not occupied the floor at all on this subject, I hope his time will not be limited.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the general discussion I lost my place on account of illness. I would like sufficient time to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks an extension of time without limit. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Say thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, objection is made to an indefinite extension of time, but not to an extension of thirty minutes.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman had no opportunity to speak in the general debate. This is the first time he has had the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin be allowed thirty minutes in which to speak on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Wisconsin to occupy thirty minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] in his speech upon this bill, apologizing to the House for devoting so much time to the period of our history covered by the tariff acts of 1846 and 1857, said:

My only excuse for it is that there has been so much misunderstanding or misrepresentation concerning the history of what the gentlemen on the other side call the "free trade" period that it seemed necessary to make some allusion to it.

The fact that the representations and conclusions of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, in reference to this most interesting decade, remain unchallenged and unanswered is my only excuse for calling the attention of the House to the subject now.

No other portion of the gentleman's speech was so loudly applauded on the other side; no other statements so sharply arrested the attention of this House or fell with such telling effect upon the galleries; and surely no other part of that speech has been more widely quoted or commented upon by the leading journals of this country.

That fairness of manner which so adorns his utterances from the chair was carried with him to the floor, and added its charm and impressiveness to his declarations upon that interesting occasion. The vast audience, crowding this Chamber to the roof, saw as never before the benign influence of the tariff acts of 1846 and 1857. One not present on that day can scarcely realize the happy and successful manner in which a few percentages were made to tell the history of that period as never told before. He may read the words in cold type, but he can never appreciate the skillful and startling way in which the stately legislators of another generation, resting through all these years, secure in their reputations as consistent, conscientious statesmen, were called forth on that day, and with rare adroitness, completely masked by the judicial style of the gentleman from Kentucky, made witnesses against their own records.

While under the potent influence of his voice, so rich in the quality of candor, one could scarcely doubt any of his conclusions. But reading the speech from the passive and unillumined pages of the RECORD, some will have the temerity to question the soundness of his deductions, comment on his omissions, and even criticise his statements.

The basis of his argument is the extraordinary prosperity, as he portrays it, of the decade from 1850 to 1860, the direct result, he maintains, of the tariff legislation of 1846.

To prove the prosperity and that it is the direct result of the tariff act of 1846, first he selects certain industries and gives percentages of increase from 1849 to 1859, as found in the censuses of 1850 and of 1860; and second, he declares that the results of the act of 1846 were so beneficent that in 1857—

Every Representative from that part of the country—

New England—

who voted at all voted for a bill making an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846 and placing many additional articles on the free-list.

The industries which he selects to furnish the percentages of prosperity are the manufactures of woolens, cottons, hosiery, hardware, and boots and shoes. And he states that—

The value of all our woolen manufactures increased more than 42 per cent.

That—

In the Eastern States the increase in the value of the product of hosiery was 481 per cent.

That—

The value of the production of cotton in the United States increased 77 per cent.

That—

The increase in the value of the product in the manufacture of boots and shoes was 83 per cent.

And that—

In the manufacture of hardware New England increased the value of her product 100 per cent.

The fallacy of such an argument, the trick of the percentage scheme, is so plain to the man who reflects that I only mention it in passing to a consideration of his figures. At this period in our history the manufacturing industries were so small compared with the present that any increase at all would show a large percentage. If there was but one factory in a given industry, and during the ten years another of equal capacity was built, there would be an increase of 100 per cent. for gentlemen to talk about, and yet the growth of that industry in the ten years would be really of very little importance to the country, and would indicate an exceedingly slow and discouraging development. To illustrate the misleading character of this style of argument from the facts of history, the percentage of increase in the woolen industry from 1850 to 1860 is given as 42 per cent., and from 1860 to 1870 as only 50 per cent., and yet the increase in the value of the product from 1860 to 1870 was nearly five times as great as from 1850 to 1860.

No argument based upon percentages can be relied upon which does not state all of the facts constituting the basis of the calculations from which the percentages are derived and carry the same system over into the different periods with which comparisons are made.

The gentleman from Kentucky does not give the underlying facts, but goes swiftly from the bare percentages alone to this conclusion. He says:

Instead of paralyzing the industries and pauperizing labor in New England, or any other part of the country, for that matter, the tariff of 1846 infused new life and vigor into our languishing manufactures and secured more constant employment and higher wages to our laboring people.

Is this true?

It has been said of the tariff act of 1846, touching our leading manufactures, that—

It put almost all duties at one of three ad valorem rates without any intelligent reference to either revenue or protection. Some industries got a fair degree of protection; a few got too much; the majority got too little or none at all.

A more accurate statement would be that some branches of a single industry were practically destroyed, while others in the same industry were highly protected under this arbitrary classification. It fixed the duty on all cotton goods at one of two rates; boots and shoes at one of two rates; the large and widely differing articles of hardware at one of two rates; iron in its different forms at one, woolens from coarse yarns to the most highly finished cloths, one of three, and so on through the entire list. In many of these industries there were from 10 to 40 different varieties and articles, some requiring a high degree of skill, some largely hand-wrought, and many made almost exclusively by machinery. Hence, under the inequalities of this system, while values were greatly disturbed and general progress retarded, while manufacturers were obliged to curtail the production of varieties in their business, they concentrated on the better protected lines of their industries and held up in some measure the averages of growth.

While the duty on certain kinds of cottons was considerably reduced by the act of 1846, still cotton fared better than most manufactures, and the coarser cotton fabrics were left amply protected. Indeed, a study of the history of this industry shows that for the last forty-six years the tariff on the lower grade cottons has been almost prohibitory. This has offered a safe investment for capital and led to the rapid development of these lines through all the years, thus keeping up the percentage of growth for the whole industry, even under the acts of 1846 and 1857. This point was clearly made by Mr. De Witt, of Massachusetts, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the discussion on the tariff bill of 1857. He said:

The care which the Government has extended to the manufactures of cotton has enabled them, besides supplying their own markets, to send abroad to India, the Mediterranean, to South America, and other markets, coarse fabrics, such as sheetings, drillings, checks, stripes, etc.; but, sir, the finer fabrics are all imported from abroad, and will continue to be, unless Congress shall extend that encouragement so necessary to a successful competition.

Consequently, if the cotton industry continued to prosper it proves nothing for the free-trade character of the Walker tariff of 1846.

Upon the leading articles in the manufacture of boots and shoes—men's boots and shoes, women's boots, bootees, shoes, and slippers, and children's boots and shoes—the act of 1846 made an average reduction of 18 per cent. But even this was much more than compensated for by the reduction of 23 per cent. on the boot and shoe makers' raw material.

Again, the gentleman holds up the hardware industry as a shining example of the glories of the tariff reduction of 1846. But an analysis and comparison of the acts of 1842 and 1846 discloses the important fact that out of the long list of articles comprising this class, the duty on just two of the items was reduced by the act of 1846, and these articles were wood-screws and tacks. Surely if this industry flourished from census years 1849 to 1859 as a result of the tariff, it was because it escaped the "reformers" of 1846 and continued its growth under the protective act of 1842.

The gentleman also speaks of the growth of the hosiery industry as marvelous. The duty on cotton knit goods was lowered by the act of 1846. But the great bulk of hosiery is classed as woolen hosiery, it being so termed whether the product be all wool or mixed. Indeed, in the act of 1842 the only hosiery mentioned is "woolen hosiery." And the growth of this industry may not appear such a marvel when it is learned that on woolen hosiery the protective duty of 1842 was not lowered at all by the act of 1846.

It will be remembered that the percentage of progress which the gentleman gives for the woolen industry is only about one-half as large as that given for cotton, hardware, boots, and shoes. Why was this? Was it because the woolen industry fared worse under the law of 1846 than the other three? Observe what follows. Out of twenty-three different lines of manufacture in woolens the act of 1846 reduced the tariff on fourteen an average of 29½ per cent.; it increased the tariff on seven lines an average of nearly 20 per cent., and on two important lines left the tariff the same.

It will therefore be seen that on some lines this erratic tariff act bore very heavily with its reductions, while others were given ample protection for the times.

On the cheaper grades of blankets, for instance, the duty was increased by the act of 1846 over that of 1842 33⅓ per cent. The tariff on broadcloth was reduced 25 per cent. below the rates of 1842. What was the result? In Massachusetts, the State leading in manufacture, the value of this product decreased from $2,157,392 to $837,650.62, or 61 per cent. in the ten years from 1845 to 1855. I give the figures for Massachusetts because it is the only State furnishing the statistics for the decade from 1845 to 1855, which shows precisely the effect of the act of 1846 on the manufacture of broadcloth.

In view of the small comparative increase in the percentage of woolens: in view of the fact that the duty on one-third of the lines was increased and on two-thirds much diminished; in view of the fact shown that the manufacture of certain lines of woolens were practically destroyed while others were fairly well protected, it might be fair to assume that for the most part those branches of this industry which were undisturbed by the act of 1846 were the ones that gave the percentage of increase for the whole industry, quoted by the gentleman from Kentucky. This assumption is proven to be entirely correct, if the condition of the woolen industry as a whole was accurately described in the reports and debates of 1857.

That this industry was not generally prosperous, that its languishing condition was attributed to the Walker tariff of 1846, is pretty vigorously stated in the report upon the tariff bill of 1857, as it first passed the House. Under the head of "Depression of the woolen interest" the committee say, "Our woolens have languished to the verge of extinction." The following from the same report emphasizes the inequalities of the law of 1846 and also gives us some further information as to woolens:

> The cotton manufacturer was protected, the woolen was abandoned, and while all the interests dependent upon it have been sacrificed, the revenue has been inflated at least four millions per annum during the last four years beyond what it would have received if the policy of the Government had been as friendly to it as it has been to the cotton manufacturer.

In ten years after the passage of the act of 1846 the importations of woolens had almost trebled, running from twelve million up to thirty-five million; while in the same time cotton imports only advanced from thirteen to fifteen and a half millions, increasing our dependence on foreign woolen factories nearly nine times as much as upon cotton.

On the 16th of February, 1857, in the tariff debate in the House, Mr. Horton, of Ohio, after calling attention to this fact, said:

> The Secretary of the Treasury informs you that the manufacture of woolen fabrics has decreased. The importation of foreign wool has decreased, while that of woolens has largely increased. No wool is exported and there is said to be only a small stock on hand. No other conclusion appears plausible except that the wool crop is greatly diminished. Uncertainty, irregularity, fluctuation in price, want of confidence in manufacturers' ability to continue their operations have produced their natural result. Add the fact that stocks in woolen manufacturing companies have gone down to a low price and there will be no doubt as to the conclusion to which I have arrived.

In the same debate, Mr. De Witt, of Massachusetts, said:

> We have more than trebled our imports of woolen goods since 1846. We have banished nearly every flock of Saxony sheep from the country, and stopped the three hundred and forty-four sets of cards and the eighteen hundred broad looms which worked annually more than eight and a quarter millions of pounds of these fine wools.

The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE, quotes from the speech of Senator—afterwards Vice-President—Wilson, in the tariff debate of 1857, with hearty approval, a few paragraphs on the subject of the tariff on wool and other raw materials used by the manufacturer. He introduces his quotations from Senator Wilson with the commendation for his information and opinion on this subject, saying that he was—

> A gentleman who perhaps understood as thoroughly as any one the real condition and necessities of his constituents.

It is strange perhaps that the gentleman from Kentucky did not take Senator Wilson's testimony on the condition of the woolen industry at that time. But as he overlooked it, I may perhaps venture to give it. I quote from the same speech, delivered in the United States Senate February 26, 1857:

> At this time, when the great interests of the nation depend upon the proper adjustment of the duties upon imports, the woolen manufacturers present their condition to the attention of Congress—to the consideration of American statesmen. They tell you, Mr. President, and they tell you truly, that the tariff of 1846 has borne heavily upon their interests. They tell you, and they tell you truly, that under the operations of the tariff of 1846 the manufacture of the finer and better classes of woolens has almost entirely ceased; that one by one the mills for the manufacture of these finer classes of woolens have been compelled to succumb; that hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in these mills have been lost, that even in the manufacture of the coarser qualities of woolens hundreds of thousands of dollars have been sunk.
> And again, the woolen manufacturers tell you, and they tell you truly, that their interests are depressed, greatly depressed, under the present policy. They point you to their silent spindles and looms, to their depreciated property.

This was the condition of one of the leading industries of our country. This was the happy situation which the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] had in mind when he declares that—

> The tariff act of 1846 infused new life and vigor into our languishing manufactures.

When he asserts that—

> Even the strong prejudices of New England were removed by actual experience.

Sir, no man can read that debate on the bill of 1857 without comprehending that a desire for relief from the effects of the act of 1846 was the controlling motive with Senator Wilson and other representatives of New England in both branches of Congress. The wool-grower and manufacturer did not understand their mutual dependence then as now, and their supposed conflicting interests constituted the most important part of that discussion; and indeed they had been placed in extraordinary position by the hideous tariff deformity of 1846, which put more than one-third of the manufactures of wool at a lower tariff than the raw material.

Is it strange, then, I ask gentlemen, that some of the representatives of New England were ready to vote even for a bill vicious in certain provisions which gave to the manufacturers free wool of all the coarser grades, upon which they had been obliged to pay a tariff of 30 per cent., and to that extent gave to them an increase in the tariff on certain manufactures of woolens over the then existing rate?

No, no, Mr. CARLISLE, these gentlemen did not, as you say, "declare by their vote that a further reduction would be beneficial to their industries," but they did declare that the act of 1846 had given certain lines of certain leading New England industries an almost mortal hurt; and that, though the aid offered had something of peril in it for other manufactures, it would for the time being build up the waste places where the Walker tariff had made such utter havoc and ruin. Need we marvel that some of them voted as they did? It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the statistics show gains in the important industries during the decade in question. I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this point. Still I maintain that other causes, of which I shall speak presently, gave rare and unusual advantages to all business, and that an average increase is not at all inconsistent with the great business disturbances experienced under the laws of '46 and '57, laws which gave ample protection to certain lines of many industries and subjected others to the destructive influence of free-trade competition.

The gentleman selected industries to point his argument which with one exception would show especially large percentages, but he singularly, with one exception, selected those which the act of 1846 either did not reduce at all as a whole or but slightly as a whole.

He also makes the claim that the percentage of increase in the wages paid exceeded the percentage of increase in the number of hands employd and that hence the low tariff of 1846 "secured higher wages to our laboring people." In another portion of his speech he endeavors to account for the much higher rate of wages under the more recent protective period of our history in quite another way. If wages increase under protection the gentleman finds that "the most efficient cause" of the increase is the introduction and use of machinery in combination with skilled labor; that a man using machinery can turn out a hundred times more product than by hand, and consequently earns and receives higher wages. But it seems never to have occurred to the gentleman that this same argument turned against that other portion of his speech might account for and explain his little percentage of advance in wages as well as aid most materially in making up the percentage of growth in the several industries cited.

Why, sir, the study of our industrial progress discloses the fact that there came greater comparative development from inventions from 1842 to 1862 than in any like period of time before in our whole history. It is true that the recent years are rich in great inventions, but they are largely improvements on existing inventions; besides, the conditions are entirely changed, and their influence on on an industrial world crowded and noisy with labor-saving machinery is not so marked, does not so revolutionize manufacturing as a generation ago.

In hosiery it was not till about 1840 that the rotary-power loom was patented. From 1813 until that time but five patents were issued on machines for manufacturing hosiery; from 1840 to 1851 but thirteen, while from 1851 to 1860 there were seventy-nine patents issued. In 1848 one hand could weave but 4 yards of carpets per day. Bigelow perfected and patented the power loom for weaving carpets with which a single hand could weave 25 yards in a day, and at once this business was lifted for the time-being above the malign influence of foreign competition. It was not until 1851 that the ingenious machine for pegging boots and shoes was patented. With this machine one man could peg a boot in three minutes. The importance of such an invention in an industry where pegged boots and shoes constituted three-fourths of the entire manufacture can at this time scarcely be calculated, but it is enough in itself to account for any percentage of growth made during the decade following.

To that portion of the gentleman's speech where he reviews the action of the House somewhat in detail upon the tariff bill of 1857, and which has occasioned much comment throughout the country, I invite the special attention of gentlemen present here to-day.

He says that the results of the act of 1846 were so beneficial that in 1857—every Representative from that part of the country (New England) who voted at all voted for a bill making an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846 and placing many additional articles on the free list.

This was upon the bill, he says, as it "first passed the House;" and speaking further in detail of this same vote he says:

Every Representative from New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island was present and voted for the bill, and among them appears the name of the venerable and distinguished Senator who still serves his State at the other end of the Capitol, Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

This statement shows just enough familiarity with the history of "the tariff act of 1857 as it first passed the House" to misquote the record and misrepresent the men who made it. With a reckless indifference to plain and established facts, this declaration tramples under foot the verified reports of that Congress and plays with the reputation of a distinguished, consistent, life-long protectionist with a vandal hand. It transforms a devotee to the American system into a heretic and makes him worship the British beast. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Keep the gentleman's [Mr. CARLISLE's] statement in mind:

Every Representative from that part of the country—

New England—

who voted at all voted for a bill making an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846.

And going into this vote in detail, he adds:

Among them appears the name of the venerable and distinguished Senator who still serves his State at the other end of the Capitol, Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

This is an error so gross and unjust as to demand correction, if for no other purpose than to do justice to the honored name of the Senator from Vermont, then a member of this House, and rebuke the carelessness of the gentleman from Kentucky, who used it with such emphasis and telling effect on the occasion of his speech.

I challenge him or any gentleman on the other side to mention a single reduction upon any important article of manufacture by the bill as it first passed the House, when Senator MORRILL voted for it.

Instead of making, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, "an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846," as it first passed the House, when all the New England Representatives and Senator MORRILL voted for it, the bill was a protective measure, came from a committee which made in its report one of the most powerful arguments for protection ever submitted by a committee of this House, and did not make a horizontal or 20 per cent. reduction at all. There was a Treasury surplus then as now, and the bill as it first passed the House was designed to reduce that surplus without impairment or injury to American industries. It was based upon protective principles. It added such articles to the free-list as were not in competition with the productions of this country. It did nothing more. It simply added to the free-list, and made no reduction upon manufactures whatever.

There was no reason why Mr. MORRILL should not vote for it, and to seek to make that vote cast for the bill as it first passed the House a scar of inconsistency on the record of that gentleman is either inexcusable blundering or the meanest sort of political pettifogging. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, when the bill for which Mr. MORRILL and all the New England Representatives had voted went over to the Senate what did the Democrats there say of it? Did they say it made "an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846?"

Let us see. Take for instance the statement of that distinguished Democrat who devised the substitute which finally, with some modification made in the Senate and some further amendment in conference committee became the law of 1857, Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia. He said:

The bill which passed the House does nothing but add to the free-list. The bill does nothing for the consumers. On all the articles he uses the duties remain as they are, the addition to the free-list is for the benefit of the manufacturer.

And again:

The bill as sent from the House of Representatives proposes that whatever advantages are to be derived from its operation shall be given to the manufacturer alone and keeping the existing rate of duty on everything else.

I do not know how it appears to other gentlemen, I simply take the carefully prepared speech of the leader of his party in this House; take his statement that such was the experience of the Representatives of the New England States during the eleven years of 1846 to 1857:

That they came here and by a unanimous vote demanded a still further reduction in the interest of the manufacturers.

I take that statement and place against it the stubborn facts of the record. I place against it the statement of that other distinguished Democratic leader, Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, that the bill for which Mr. MORRILL and the other New England Representatives voted unanimously, "did nothing but add to the free-list," and that "the additions to the free-list are for the benefit of 'the manufacturers alone.'"

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I trust the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be extended so as to enable him to finish his remarks.

Mr. REED. I think that courtesy ought to be allowed the gentleman. This speech ought not to be interrupted here.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RICHARDSON). Will the gentleman indicate what amount of time he desires?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Twenty minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked of the committee that the time of the gentleman be further extended for twenty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BYNUM. I will not object to this extension, as the gentleman has probably been led to expect that general consent would be given; but hereafter I shall insist on the enforcement of the five-minute rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What became of this bill in the Senate? The gentleman from Kentucky says it—was sent to the Senate where it was amended by making a very slight increase in the reduction on certain articles.

Had the gentleman been correctly advised he would have stated that instead of a "very slight increase in the reduction on certain articles," the whole character of the bill which had passed the House, and for which Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL had voted, was changed completely, that it died the death in the Senate, was literally wiped out of legislative existence, and that a bill, devised and offered by Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, was substituted for it, but no more like the House bill than free trade is like protection.

It is true that a portion of the free-list of the House bill which made it acceptable to the manufacturing interests on its first passage was incorporated in Mr. Hunter's Senate substitute and drew to it on its return to the House the votes of eighteen New England Representatives, but it was there in the Senate that the infernal invention known as the "20 per cent. reduction on nearly all manufactures from the act of 1846" was unfortunately joined to a portion of the House bill—

Like a mildewed ear
Blasting his wholesome brother—and bringing to the financial and industrial interests demoralization and ruin bordering on absolute chaos.

The Republicans of the Senate who voted for it were manifestly moved to do so to secure free raw material for the manufactures, and escape in some measure the ruin threatened by the existing tariff of 1846. But in many signal instances they prayed to be delivered from the consequences of their own acts in voting for the Senate substitute, and indulged the hope that the House would force upon the Senate conferees their protection bill, and some beneficial legislation result.

Hon. William H. Seward, who favored then a reduction of the surplus, as Republicans do now, was obliged to vote against the Senate substitute, because though it had a little sop here and there thrown to protectionists to catch votes, as this bill has, it was nevertheless opposed to the American system, just as this bill is, and so he tried to strike it down. He subsequently supported the conference report.

And though Senators Wilson and Sumner voted for the substitute, the moving reason given by Mr. Wilson, speaking for both, was a—deep interest in the modification of the tariff of 1846 by this Congress.

He further said of the Senate substitute:

I am confident the bill can not pass the House; but I shall support it if the House bill can not pass here, in the confident hope that a committee of conference can so blend the two propositions as to secure the support of both Houses.

The gentleman from Kentucky, while claiming such beneficial results from the act of 1857, bestowed with somewhat too generous hand the sole credit for the measure on the Republicans of that Congress. It was a rare and striking instance of Democratic magnanimity. What he did not avow he suggested and implied. In one instance he adroitly says:

Here is the vote on the act of 1857 as it first passed the House, a Republican House, over which Nathaniel P. Banks presided as Speaker.

And later, of the vote on the Senate substitute, he said:

And thus the tariff act of 1857, which we have so often heard denounced on the other side of the House, became the law of the land by the votes of Republican and New England Representatives.

As the excessive generosity of the gentleman from Kentucky robs the Democrats of their just share of credit for this important legislation, I give the vote.

The House at that time numbered 234 Representatives. The Republicans had only 108 members and were in the minority, but had secured the election of Mr. Banks as Speaker. The Democrats numbered 83, and the Americans or Know Nothings 43. Thirty of the Know Nothings were from the Southern Democratic States.

Of the Republicans who voted, all but 39 voted against the tariff of 1857. Of the Democrats who voted, all voted for it except 4. The Democrats who voted for the bill outnumbered the Republicans nearly 2 to 1. And to this may be added the votes of all the Know Nothings from south of Mason and Dixon's line who voted excepting 3.

And thus the tariff act of 1857, which we have so often heard extolled on the other side of the House, but which has been execrated by the good people of this country for nearly a generation, became the law of the land by the votes of Democratic free-traders and Know Nothings from the South.

I do not know that I can better illustrate the utter unfairness of the gentleman's language than to apply his method to the present situation. Suppose the pending bill should pass here and go to the Senate, that it should there be changed from a free-trade bill to a protective bill, should be returned to this House and be passed by it, a few Democrats voting with the Republicans, how would the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] enjoy the idea of a Republican Speaker of this House a generation hence coming from his high place to this floor to say of the Democratic party, to say of the gentleman from Kentucky, that so well pleased was he with the results of the Morrill tariff that he voted for and made a speech in favor of the protective bill of 1888 as it first passed the House; that this bill, after undergoing a few trifling changes in the Senate, came back and again passed the House—a Democratic House—Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, presiding?

The honorable gentleman replying to the charge respecting the depleted condition of the Treasury, and especially to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], denied that the tariff acts of 1846 and 1857 had contributed to the business depression and bankruptcy of 1857, and asserted that the credit of the Government had not been impaired and no Government bonds or Treasury notes "sold at less than par" until within ten days of the close of Buchanan's administration. The authority cited by the gentleman to sustain this statement may take no account of the details of the Treasury transactions connected with the efforts to raise money during the last year of Buchanan's administration. Whether discounts were not entered on the Treasury books as discounts, but as "commissions," or in some other manner still, or whether no record was made and preserved there at all of the arrangements with syndicates of bankers to float Government obligations does not signify. History has preserved for us the facts of that vexed period, and without favor or political bias hands them down to us with their lesson for to-day.

Appleton's Encyclopedia for 1861, as well as McPherson's History of the Rebellion, recites the Treasury transactions for that time substantially as given in the History of the Protective Tariff, by Hon. R. W. Thompson, ex-Secretary of the Navy and a former member of this House. I quote from page 426 of his work:

> In October, 1860, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, who had largely contributed to the results then existing, offered for sale $10,000,000 of the 5 per cent. Government stocks, half of the $20,000,000 authorized by Congress. Bids were made for this at a small premium, but only a portion of it was realized, on account of some of the bidders having withdrawn their offers. Congress was consequently compelled to pass a law in December, 1860, authorizing the issue of $10,000,000 of Treasury notes as another expedient for borrowing money. The Secretary of the Treasury at once offered $5,000,000 of these notes for sale, which had the effect of demonstrating the humiliating fact that the credit of the Government was lower than that of many individual citizens. Bids were made for only $500,000 of the $5,000,000, and these at varying rates of discount, some 36, some 24, and the lowest 12 per cent. discount.
> As it was absolutely necessary to raise money to pay the interest upon the public debt, due January 1, 1861, the Secretary closed the $500,000 at 12 per cent. This, however, fell short of the necessary amount, and, to prevent the Government from failing in the payment of the interest, a loan of $1,500,000 was made of a syndicate of banks and bankers at 12 per cent. In a short time the remainder of the Treasury notes were disposed of at the same rate and to the same syndicate. And by these measures was the Government enabled to obtain relief from the financial pressure. It had to be done by borrowing money upon such terms and such a rate of discount as would drive any business man into insolvency. But even this relief was at most a mere temporary expedient. And not the least humiliating feature of it was the fact that, at the same time, the State of New York sold $1,200,000 of her State bonds for premiums varying from 1¼ to 2¼ per cent.
> In January the Secretary offered another loan of $5,000,000 and received bids varying from 8¾ to 11 per cent. discount, the credit of the National Government being thus reduced below that of the States.

This was all in October, November, December, and January, months prior to the time when the gentleman from Kentucky states that Government securities were sold at a discount. He says none were sold at a discount "from the time of the passage of the tariff act of 1846 down to the last ten days of Mr. Buchanan's administration."

The gentleman from Kentucky may possibly be correct in this statement, but there is at least very good authority, as I have shown, for believing that he is also in error upon this point.

Gentlemen may differ in their opinions as to what caused the general business depression and disaster of these years and sent the Government disgraced into the streets to hawk about her notes and bonds at a discount; nevertheless the following table of receipts and expenditures will show the effect of the tariff of 1857 on the condition of the Treasury, and may enable those interested to nose out the taint which had fastened itself upon the public credit:

Years.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Expenditures over receipts.
1857	$63,875,905	$66,041,143	$2,165,238
1858	41,789,820	72,339,437	30,540,817
1859	49,565,824	66,355,950	16,790,126
1860	53,187,511	60,056,754	6,869,243
1861	39,582,125	62,616,055	23,033,930
Total	248,000,985	327,409,339	79,399,354

During the same period the public debt increased year by year as follows:

1857	$28,699,831
1858	44,911,881
1859	58,496,837
1860	64,842,287
1861	90,580,873

Our imports of all kinds of foreign merchandise, exclusive of coin and bullion, for the year 1849, the earliest date for which the official figures are at hand, amounted to $141,206,199 in value. In 1859 they reached the sum of $331,333,341; and in the eleven years from 1849 to 1859 inclusive, amounted to a total of $2,805,369,211.

Our exports of all kinds of both domestic and foreign productions, excepting precious metals, were, in 1849, $140,351,172, and in 1859 $232,802,051. In the eleven years the total amount was $2,438,598,177, leaving a balance against us on the merchandise account of $366,771,034.

Judged by any fair tests—as revenue measures, by their effects upon manufacturing, by their effects upon agriculture—the acts of 1846 and 1857 fail and fail signally.

The effect of the act of 1846 on agriculture is well demonstrated in the facts furnished by President Fillmore in his message of December 2, 1851, five years after its enactment:

> The values of our domestic exports for the last fiscal year as compared with those of the previous year exhibit an increase of $43,646,322. At first this condition of our trade with foreign nations would seem to present the most flattering hope of its future prosperity. An examination of the details of our exports, however, will show that the increased value of our exports for the last fiscal year is to be found in the high price of cotton which prevailed during the last half of that year, which price has since declined about one-half. The value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, which it was supposed the incentive of a low tariff and large importations from abroad would have largely augmented, has fallen from $68,701,921 in 1817 to $26,051,373 in 1850, and to $21,848,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the current year.
> The aggregate values of rice exported during the last fiscal year, as compared with the previous year, also exhibit a decrease amounting to $460,917, which, with the decline in the values of the exports of tobacco for the same period, make an aggregate decrease in these two articles of $1,156,751.
> The policy which dictated a low rate of duties on foreign merchandise, it was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of the country by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets. The foregoing facts, however, seem to show incontestably that no such result has followed the adoption of the policy.

Buchanan, in his message of December 8, 1857, gives this testimony as to the condition of the country after eleven years under the tariff acts of 1846 and 1857:

> The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present time in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other point and I am done. Protectionists are sometimes criticised for referring the prosperity of the last quarter of a century to the maintenance of their economic principles. The language I have already cited from the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky is enough to show how he labors first to prove growth and prosperity from the passage of the tariff of 1846 until 1860, and then how broadly and unqualifiedly he claims it all as due to the low tariffs of 1846 and 1857. Nothing gets out of his net. These laws not only made wool cheap to the manufacturer, but in some unaccountable way the farmer got a higher price for it. They not only made all manufactured articles cost less, but by some magic gave the manufacturers greater profits and greater prosperity. They not only made wages higher but everything cheaper which the laborer turned out, and still left the employer a larger margin. In short, sir, they kept both ends of the teeter in the air at the same time. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] From the gentleman's view they were simply most marvelous pieces of legislation.

The gentleman entirely ignores those more remote but still powerful influences so material in keeping us afloat, buoying us up, and at times carrying us to the very crest of the wave. Influences both at home and abroad fortunately joined, placing this country in some measure beyond the harm of unwise legislation and bearing to the American people unexpected and for a time almost unlimited wealth.

He counts as nothing the discovery of gold in California, timed so fortunately for the business interests of this country. It gave new life and vigor to commerce and manufactures, quickened the lagging pace of trade, awoke sleepy villages and towns, and fairly stirred the world with new spirit. Thousands from every class and calling flocked to the mines. Money suddenly became plenty, wages increased, men were in demand, and labor heard calls on every side. Why, stop and think; more than $600,000,000 in gold produced from those mines during the census period under consideration.

What were the conditions abroad? Sir, at no time in the whole history of this people have the circumstances abroad ever so unqualifiedly and bountifully favored this country? Even the misfortunes and calamities of other nations were timed and turned to our advantage.

Simultaneously with the discovery of gold in California came that in Australia, yielding with our own product more than a thousand million of dollars. In the midst of all famine and war smote heavily the productive industries of nearly all Europe, checking their competition, breaking down many lines, and opening the way and the market for American produce of every kind.

And yet not all the favoring circumstances, not all the accidents of fortune, not all the rare and auspicious coincidences both at home and abroad could long avert the certain and direful financial calamity coming as the logical result of laws designed to make Europe and America industrially alike. We had sowed the wind, we reaped the whirlwind. Talk as does the gentleman from Kentucky of recovering from the depression of 1857 "in a few months?" It is trifling with the facts of history. Sir, the rebellion was upon us before we could regain financial strength and business stability. Following 1857 all credit and confidence and prosperity seemed to have departed this country. The crash of the banks carried down with them $200,000,000. "The country recovered in a few months?" Why, within twelve months following 1857 the currency of this country was contracted more than $60,000,000. The streets and highways were crowded with honest men begging for work at any price. There was no striking for higher wages then. Labor was out in search of bread, and want was no stranger to our people for the remainder of that decade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Writing of this time, Henry C. Carey, the economist, changed from a free-trader to a protectionist by just such experiences as this, said:

> With 1857 came the culmination of the whole system. Merchants and manufacturers became ruined, banks being compelled to suspend payment, and the Treasury being reduced to a condition of bankruptcy. In the three years which followed labor was everywhere in excess. Wages were low, immigration below the point at which it had stood for twenty years before, the home market for food diminished, and the foreign one proved so utterly worthless that the whole export to all the manufacturing nations of Europe amounted to little more than $10,000,000.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman's showing as to these years is explained by reference to the arbitrary character of the tariff act of 1846, leaving as it did some lines of an industry undisturbed, touching a few but lightly, and breaking others down altogether; by the fact that the percentages of growth are largest in those industries least disturbed and that manufacturers concentrated on the lines in each industry least hurt, and in that way kept up some percentages of growth; by the fact that the impetus given under the protective tariff of 1842 to 1846 stimulated inventions which culminated in a few years and carried manufacturing from hand work to hand and machine work combined, increasing production while greatly reducing its cost, and thus sustaining industries even under the hostile and adverse acts of 1846 and 1857; by the fact that the official reports, the debates, the history of the times record great disturbance, fluctuation and depression in business all through that decade; by the fact that outside of the influences of legislation the extraordinary advantages at home and abroad could not prevent financial disaster lasting and severe; by the fact that the fruits of this policy upon the country was an empty Treasury, enormous debt, injured credit. [Loud and continued applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a privileged question. On the 11th of May last, in connection with the remarks I made upon House bill No. 9051, to reduce taxation, I took occasion to refer to the enormous profits realized by some of the protected industries of this country under our present tariff laws, and I then stated in proof certain facts which had come to my knowledge in regard to the profits in one year of one of these companies, and which a certain party—a beneficiary under this policy—had personally admitted to me was correct. I, however, did not mention the names of individuals, only incorporated companies.

Perhaps no company in the United States has a larger interest in the iron and steel industries of the country than the one I named, and in referring to it in connection with these industries and the protective system generally as advocated by the Republican party, I used no language that any man, having even the slightest instincts of a gentleman, could take exceptions to. I did refer to the large profit made by this company and how it was acquired, and in doing this I cast no personal reflections, nor did I use any discourteous language. I referred to this company to illustrate a policy, which, in my judgment, is unfair and unjust to the great masses of our people, and I did not pretend to claim that any company or individual had not the right and were not perfectly justified in availing themselves of unjust and unequal laws to amass money.

It was the system and the results upon the country and the people of the country, as illustrated by this company, as a beneficiary under such a policy only, that I referred to.

Now, Mr. Carnegie, who assumed I referred to him, did, in a letter to James M. Swank, before he sailed for Cluny Castle, attempt to deny in part the interview as stated by myself, but he did so in gentlemanly and courteous language.

Such language as "absolutely falsifies them" and other similar expressions, applied to any gentleman on this floor, I will leave the country to judge of, but coming from the senior member of this House [Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania], whose long parliamentary experience in it and his assumed knowledge of parliamentary law demonstrate that neither age nor association can cultivate in one what nature has not given him—those traits of character which gentlemen recognize both in public and private life as the best types of true manhood.

Mr. Speaker, on the 6th instant the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], during my absence from the House, and two months after the date of the delivery of my remarks on the tariff bill, said:

> I hastened back as soon as I could, and desire, either now or at some time when more agreeable to the committee, in the course of the debate, to make a statement in connection with one point in this schedule which I alone, as an indifferent witness, am able to make.

And he further says:

> I was the only official person present at the interview.

Then the gentleman proceeds to relate an alleged interview that occurred between Mr. Carnegie and myself in the committee-room of Ways and Means.

I hardly know, sir, in what language or how to characterize the statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I say positively here that no statement made by him in connection with that interview, with the exception of that relating to Mr. Carnegie's citizenship, has the slightest foundation in fact, and that the gentleman has undoubtedly drawn upon his vivid imagination, and where misrepresentation better answers his purpose than facts he has no hesitation in availing himself of it. It is a tissue of misrepresentations from beginning to end of the interview as it occurred, made out of whole cloth.

In the first place the gentleman states:

> Meanwhile Mr. Carnegie had an appointment with me—> in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means. Observing that Mr. SCOTT and he did not recognize each other, I said to Mr. Carnegie, sotto voce, "there is WILLIAM L. SCOTT." "Indeed," said Mr. Carnegie, "introduce me to him, will you, that I may briefly correct some of his misrepresentations." I hesitated and introduced them, etc.
>

Now, sir, the facts are these: I was in the room of the Committee of Ways and Means on the day Mr. KELLEY states, behind a screen washing my hands. Any gentleman entering the committee-room could not see me. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY, came into the room, and in his usual sonorous voice asked if Mr. SCOTT was in. Mr. Talbott, the clerk of the committee, stated that I was washing my hands behind the screen. There were other gentlemen in the room, all of whom I can not now recall, but some of them I can, among others Mr. U. H. Painter, of this city. I came out in a minute or two after Mr. KELLEY entered and he said he wanted to introduce me to Mr. Carnegie. He did not say: "There is Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT." He introduced me to Mr. Carnegie, and Mr. Carnegie and myself entered into a general conversation for a few moments, not relating to the tariff or the subject which subsequently followed. At last Mr. Carnegie remarked to me that I had done him an injustice in stating he was not a citizen of the United States. I expressed my regret if I had made any statement of the kind which was incorrect; that I had been told by a mutual friend of ours in Pittsburgh, who I presumed would know, that he was not a citizen of the United States, and I certainly made no such statement to intentionally wrong him, and I was satisfied that I had been misinformed from the statements which he then made to me, and I would most cheerfully acknowledge the fact if there were any necessity or occasion for doing so. This was all that was said in regard to his citizenship.

He then remarked further that I had made another statement which was incorrect; that I had said that the Edgar Thomson Steel Works had made as high as $1,500,000 in one year; and he stated that that sum would not pay the interest either on the mortgage debt of the company or the interest on the cost of the works, I can not recall to which he applied it. I replied that I had not made any such statement as that, and he inquired what I had said. To this I answered that I had stated he had drawn out of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works as his share of the profits during one year as high as $1,500,000, or the equivalent of $5,000 a day for three hundred days. He promptly replied that that was correct, and that he did not deny it. But he said: "You may not perhaps be aware that in that year I gave to the city of Pittsburgh the sum of $500,000 for a library, and to the city of Allegheny $300,000."

These are the figures as I recall them. To this I answered that certainly the contribut on of so large a sum of money by any gentleman for either educational or charitable purposes under ordinary circumstances would entitle him to great credit, but that in his case I did not think it rose to that high order of philanthropy which under different circumstances he might be entitled to. That if in fair and open competition with his fellow men he had accumulated $1,500,000 in one year and had given away one million of it, as he stated, no one could question the motives by which he was influenced. That where a system of bad and vicious laws enabled a man to accumulate $1,500,000 in one year out of any industry of the country as his share alone of the profits of his company he might well afford to be liberal with his gains to popularize a policy that makes it possible for him to make in one year so large a sum of money. Mr. Carnegie's reply to me was, "Oh, you are a free-trader." I said, "Yes, I am a free-trader, if you mean by that that I am opposed to such a policy as discriminates in favor of the few against the many."

Mr. KELLEY took no part in this conversation, and Mr. Carnegie bid me good day, and left. Not one word in regard to the profits on steel rails passed between us, and in fact there was no occasion that any such conversation should have occurred. I never stated in my remarks that the profits of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works were made from steel rails alone. I am too thoroughly acquainted with the various productions of the Edgar Thomson Company not to know that their large accumulated profits are derived from various steel and iron products made by them outside of steel rails.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to be qualified that this is substantially what transpired between Mr. Carnegie and myself, and that the statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are totally incorrect, except as to Mr. Carnegie's citizenship; and I will endeavor to have printed with these remarks the statements of other gentlemen present, of the same political faith as Mr. Carnegie and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, although they may not be "official persons," but who are at least entitled to as much credit for veracity as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that will confirm what I have said.

Mr. COX (when the five minutes of Mr. SCOTT had expired) said: I hope the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be extended.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not desire more than two minutes more.

Mr. BYNUM. I am informed there is an understanding that some gentlemen on the other side, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and others, are to have an extension of time. I am willing, of course, that this side of the House should use as much time as may be occupied by the other; but when the existing understanding has been carried out, I am going to insist on the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to permitting the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to continue his remarks for two minutes longer? The Chair hears none.

[Mr. SCOTT resumed and concluded his remarks as already given.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will now be recognized for thirty minutes, in accordance with the previous order of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] proceeds, I desire to give notice, since the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], that I will print in the RECORD extracts from a speech by General Garfield and from the late speech of Mr. CARLISLE. I suppose after the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] I should say the late Mr. CARLISLE——

Mr. REED. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I desired to give notice—I suppose it is not necessary to ask leave—that I would publish in the RECORD extracts from a speech of General Garfield, and also from the late speech of Mr. CARLISLE——

Mr. REED. The "late Mr. CARLISLE," I thought the gentleman said.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Well, the "late Mr. CARLISLE;" and no doubt it is a matter of very great pity that Mr. CARLISLE has been run over so badly this afternoon, but still——

Mr REED. Perhaps he can take care of himself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He is not too great to be spoken of.

Mr. REED. He might possibly take care of himself.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman has had ample occasion to know that he is not only able to take care of himself, but able to take care of anybody who may have preceded him.

Mr. REED. I beg to say that I have never had any personal occasion to know it of him or any other Kentucky gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no doubt the modesty of the gentleman from Maine is only equaled by his merit.

Mr. REED. Only equaled by my accuracy.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I admit that; your modesty is only equaled by your accuracy.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Both of us agree as to that.

Mr. REED. They are both great.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no doubt the gentleman thinks so; and that is an evidence both of his modesty and of his accuracy in a single sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BAYNE. Is it the intention to reproduce the speech of Mr. CARLISLE?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As I stated, I want to publish in the RECORD extracts from a speech of Mr. Garfield and also from the late speech of Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. BAYNE. I presume the gentleman does not intend to reproduce the speech of Mr. CARLISLE in full?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. An extract from it.

Mr. BAYNE. The complete speech has already been published in the RECORD.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And no doubt very widely read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The Chicago platform declares that—

> The protective system must be maintained. Its abandonment has always been followed by general disaster to all interests except those of the usurer and sheriff.

This is a striking and theatrical sentence; but the historical statement contained in it is capable of proof or contradiction. The Walker tariff was a distinct "abandonment" of the protective system, and the country tried that experiment from 1846 to 1857, a period sufficiently long to give that system of low tariff with ad valorem rates a fair trial. In 1857 Congress, after full debate, with the concurrence of a majority of New England and its Representatives, reduced the rates; and the universal judgment of the country was in approval of the experiment commenced in 1846. So that the decade from 1850 to 1860 may be accepted as the fair witness as to the truth of the statement of fact made in the Republican platform. The following extracts from the speeches of General Garfield and Mr. CARLISLE cover one of the periods referred to in that platform, as well as that upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin comments:

[Remarks of Hon. James A. Garfield, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 6, 1878, pages 1525-6, volume 28, Forty-fifth Congress.]

The first forty minutes of his two hour and a half speech were devoted to overturning a proposition of mine which was incidental and not vitally essential to my argument. The line of my argument was this: that it was generally conceded that 1860 was a time of peace and of general prosperity in this country; that there was fair employment of labor and fair remuneration for the laborer; that it was an era of free banking and the volume of the currency was $207,000,000, the largest which this country had ever had, except for a brief period in the panic year of 1857. On that statement I drew the conclusion that it was due to gentlemen who said that we had not now enough currency to show how, after all that has occurred to us in years past, the present depression of prices, which are nearly if not altogether as low as in 1860, and the present non-occupation of laborers, three times as much currency now as we had in 1860 was still insufficient.

That was the drift of my argument and upon the preliminary declaration that the year 1860 was one of peace and fair prosperity throughout the country the gentleman spent forty minutes to show that 1860 was one of our most distressful years, except perhaps the present, that this country has ever known. In the first place he denied that it was a year of peace, and for three very curious reasons. First, because during the previous year seventeen men had invaded Virginia at Harper's Ferry. Second, because it was the year of the Presidental election. Third, because the year afterward we had a war. Well, if these three facts prove that 1860 was not a year of peace then the gentleman is entitled to say that our currency was adjusted to a war basis during that year. But he denies my statement that 1860 was a year of general prosperity, and asserts that it was a year of great business depression. And he bases this opinion upon the fact that in 1859 there was a destructive frost in some of the grain-growing sections of the country; that some iron-men say it was a disastrous year to the producers and manufacturers of iron; that there were large sheriffs' sales in Philadelphia; and that the national Government was compelled to negotiate a loan to meet its expenditures. These and the opinion of Mr. Carey are, I believe, the main grounds on which he relies for overturning my position.

For the purpose of my November speech I might have taken the whole decade from 1850 to 1860 as the base-line from which to measure the relative amount of currency needed before the war and now, but I chose the year 1860 as the last year of peace preceding the period of war and inflation. I consider it a fact, admitted by most every one, that 1860 was a year of very general prosperity, but as the gentleman denies it I will enumerate briefly a few of the grounds on which I made my statement.

In 1860 the burdens of national taxation were light. All our revenues, including loans, amounted only to $76,000,000. Our expenditures were $77,000,000, and our whole public debt but $65,000,000. In the year 1860 the tonnage of our ships upon the seas was 5,353,868 tons, which was more by 140,000 tons than in any other year of our history before or since. Two-thirds of our imports were then carried in American bottoms, as were also more than two-thirds of our exports.

Our exports that year reached the aggregate value of $400,000,000, which was forty-three and a half millions more than during any previous year. Our imports were $362,000,000, decidedly more than any other year. And I make this statement on the authority of David A. Wells, that in 1860 we were exporting to foreign countries more American manufactures than in any other year of our history. In a table printed on page 10 of the report of the special commissioner of the revenue for 1869, it appears that in 1860 there came to this country 179,000 emigrants, 58,000 more than during the preceding year.

As an exhibit of the activity and industry of our people, 4,819 patents were issued at the Patent Office in 1860, 1,100 more than the average number for the three years preceding. In that year we built 1,846 miles of railroad, a slight increase above the preceding year. The people of the United States consumed 332,000 tons of sugar in 1857, and in 1860 they consumed the enormous amount of 464,000 tons, more than in any other year of our previous history. The mean annual consumption of tea in the United States, which was 16,000,000 pounds in the decade ending with 1850, was 27,000,000 pounds in the decade ending with 1860. This certainly is an indication that the people had something to buy with.

From 1831 to 1851 the cotton crop of the United States ranged from one million to two and one-third million bales per annum. In the year 1860 it had risen to the enormous crop of 4,675,770 bales, almost 1,000,000 more bales than were ever grown in the United States in any previous year of our history.

I find from the census reports that in 1850 our wheat crop was 100,000,000 bushels, and in 1860 it was 173,000,000 bushels. In 1850 we raised 592,000,000 bushels of corn; in 1860, 838,000,000 bushels, while in 1870 we raised but 760,000,000 bushels. The crop of 1860 was 78,000,000 bushels more than that of 1870, and 346,000,000 more than that of 1850. And so with several other of the great cereals. The crop of barley for 1860 was three times that of 1850. The crops of rye and buckwheat in 1860 exceeded those of 1870, as well as those of 1850.

In 1850 the value of the American farms was three and one-quarter billions of dollars; in 1860 it was $6,645,000,000 by the census, an increase of 103 per cent., while the population increased but 35 per cent. during the decade.

The value of farming implements in 1850 was $151,000,000; in 1860 it was $246,-

000,000, an increase of 70 per cent., while during the next decade it increased but 42 per cent. From the statistics of manufactures given in the census I find that in 1860 nine hundred and fifty-seven thousand hands were employed; in 1850, thirteen hundred and eleven thousand. In 1850 the products of manufactures amounted to $553,000,000; in 1860, $1,009,000,000, an increase of 90 per cent., while population increased but 35 per cent. The products of our manufactures increased in that decade $870,000,000. But the gentleman tells us it was a year of unusual distress.

He spoke of the condition of the iron interest in that year. Let me tell him what the iron and steel associations say in their report for 1877. I find on page 28 that in 1860 there were brought from Lake Superior to our mills in the East 116,000 tons of ore, 51,000 tons more than in any other year of our history.

On page 47 of the same report I learn that the production of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania in 1860 amounted to 9,807,000 tons, almost 800,000 tons more than in any previous year. On page 12 of the same report I find that the production of bituminous coal and coke for 1860 amounted to 122,000 tons, which was 38,000 tons more than the greatest product of any preceding year. And how much pig-iron did we produce in that year? I quote from page 302 of the volume of "Speeches and Addresses" by WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a speech made by him here January 11, 1870, in which he gives the product for seven or eight years; and, according to his speech, in the year 1860 the total product of pig-iron in this country was 913,000 tons. This was 130,000 tons more than the average of the six preceding years, yet he holds that 1860 was a year of unusual distress.

This is from an old debate between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself; a debate that we had eight years ago, when to justify his extreme views on the tariff (which I do not hesitate to say have done the cause of real protection more harm than the doctrines of the extreme free-traders) it was necessary for his argument to make it appear that because we then had a low tariff 1860 was a year of great distress.

We can find ample ground for the sufficient protection of American manufacturers without distorting the history of our country. The gentleman's position lays him open to this dangerous reply that if the low tariff and insufficient volume of currency of 1860 caused the alleged distress of that year, how will he account for what he admits the great distress of 1877, with a much higher tariff and three times the currency of 1860?

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the decade from 1850 to 1860 was one of peace and general prosperity. The aggregate volume of real and personal property in the United States in 1850 was, in round millions, $7,135,000,000; in 1860 it was $16,159,000,000, an increase of 126 per cent. while the population increased but 35 per cent. Yet to suit a theory of finance we are told that 1860 was a year of great distress and depression of business equaled only by the distress of the present year.

I hold that the facts I have recited, establish, in so far as anything can be established by statistics, that the year 1860 was a year not only of general peace but of general prosperity in the United States; and the fact that there were frosts in some fields the year before, sheriff sales in Philadelphia, and unemployed laborers near some of the mills, not only does not overturn the proofs I have submitted, but these proofs show how limited were the disasters of which the gentleman speaks.

[Remarks of Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, House of Representatives, May 19, 1888.]

We have been told over and over again during this debate that the passage of the pending bill will destroy many valuable industries now flourishing in various parts of the country; that it will deprive thousands of laborers of employment and greatly reduce the wages of those who continue to work; and the gentleman from Maine, who has just spoken, has substantially repeated the gloomy predictions to which the House has listened so often during the last three weeks. Sir, if I believed that the passage of this measure would injure a single honest industry or reduce the wages of those who are employed in it, I would, notwithstanding the great emergency which confronts us, hesitate long before giving it my support. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But in my opinion the reductions now proposed on dutiable imports, and the proposed additions to the free-list, will be beneficial to the manufacturers themselves as well as to their laborers and the consumers of their products; and as the Representatives from New England on the other side of the House appear to be especially alarmed concerning the injurious effects of this bill upon the great manufacturing industries in their part of the country, it may not be inappropriate to call their attention to a few historical facts connected with our tariff legislation in the past and the effects of low rates of duty upon the prosperity of their people.

The highest rate of duty imposed by the tariff act of 1846 upon any class of woolen goods, cotton fabrics, manufactures of leather and of hardware, was 30 per cent. ad valorem, and upon most kinds of cotton goods it was only 25 per cent. These were the industries in which New England was most largely engaged, and her Representatives here, except those from the State of Maine, who were divided upon the question, protested against the passage of that act, as they now protest against the passage of the pending bill, upon the ground that it would paralyze and ruin these great interests. The Representatives from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Vermont voted unanimously against the bill, with the exception of Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, who did not vote at all. But it passed, nevertheless, and became a law; and now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what its effect was upon the most important industries of these great manufacturing States, and what the subsequent action of their Representatives was, after an experience of eleven years under these moderate rates of duty.

We have no authentic statistics showing the progress made by manufacturing industries between 1846 and 1857 as a separate and distinct period of time, but it may be fairly assumed that the full force and effect of the new rates of duty were realized at least as early as the census year 1849, and we have the census returns of 1850 and 1860, the latter based upon the productions of the year 1859, to which I beg leave to invite the attention of gentlemen from New England and other gentlemen who believe that low tariffs destroy manufactures and pauperize labor. During the period mentioned the value of all our woolen manufactures increased more than 42 per cent., the number of hands employed increased 18¼ per cent., but the total amount of wages paid increased nearly 37 per cent. [applause], showing that the percentage of increase in the amount of wages paid was twice as great as the percentage of increase in the number of hands employed. [Applause.]

Taking all the New England States together, the increase in the value of the product in this industry was 62 per cent. The increase in Massachusetts was 54 per cent.; in Rhode Island, 176 per cent.; in Vermont 61¼ per cent., and in Maine, 83¼ per cent. In the manufacture of hosiery the progress during the ten years under consideration was almost marvelous. In the Eastern States the increase in the value of the product was 481 per cent. It was 523 per cent. in Connecticut, 377 per cent. in New Hampshire, and 373 per cent. in Massachusetts.

What was the effect upon the manufacture of cotton fabrics in New England and in the whole country? Why, sir, the value of the production in the United States increased 77 per cent., the number of hands employed increased 28¼ per cent., and the total amount of wages paid increased 39 per cent. [Applause.] In New England the increase in the value of the product was over 81 per cent., in the number of hands employed 28 per cent., and in the amount of wages paid 36 per cent. Massachusetts increased her product 77 per cent., New Hampshire 55 per cent., Rhode Island over 87 per cent., Connecticut 116 per cent., Maine 137 per cent., and Vermont 27¼ per cent.

In the six New England States the increase in the value of the product in the manufacture of boots and shoes was 83 per cent.; in Massachusetts the increase was 92 per cent., in Connecticut 10 per cent., in Maine 99 per cent., and in Rhode Island 537 per cent. The production in New England alone in 1860 was greater than the aggregate production of all the States of the Union in 1850. In the manufacture of hardware New England increased the value of her product 100 per cent., and in this industry also her product in 1860 was greater than the product of all the States in 1850.

Instead of paralyzing the industries and pauperizing labor in New England, or any other part of the country, for that matter, the tariff act of 1846 infused new life and vigor into our languishing manufactures and secured more constant employment and higher wages to our laboring people; and the consequence was that even the strong prejudices of New England were removed by actual experience, and in 1857 every Representative from that part of the country who voted at all voted for a bill making an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846, and placing many additional articles on the free-list.

It may not be irrelevant to print a single paragraph from "Twenty Years of Congress," by Mr. Blaine.

[From Twenty Years of Congress, page 196, volume I.]

The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant an attempt, even had there been desire, to change the tariff. General Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure, and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character.

Moreover, the tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue, and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his administration was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849; large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government and had gradually become a free-trade party. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any of the three parties which presented Presidental candidates.

As for this testimony I ask leave to quote from the letter of J. Q. Smith, printed in report No. 2848, from the Committee on Ways and Means during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress:

By the census of 1850 the estimated value of farms in the United States was $3,271,575,426. In 1860 the value was estimated at $6,645,045,007, showing an increased value during the decade of $3,373,469,581, or more than 100 per cent. In 1870 the value of the farms was estimated at $9,262,803,861, showing an increase during the decade of $2,617,758,861, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the value of farms was estimated at $10,197,096,776, being an increase during the decade of $939,292,915, or only a fraction over 9 per cent. (See Compendium of the Census of 1880, page 658.)

The value of the live-stock in the United States in 1850 was estimated at $544,180,566. In 1860 it was valued at $1,089,329,915. The increase during the decade was $545,149,349, or over 100 per cent. In 1870 it was estimated at $1,525,276,547, being an increase during the decade of $435,946,542, or less than 4 per cent. In 1880 the live-stock was estimated at $1,500,464,609, being a decrease during the decade of nearly $25,000,000, or more than 1½ per cent.

The official valuation of taxable property in Ohio amounted in 1850 to $439,876,340. In 1860 it amounted to $888,302,601, showing an increase during the ten years of $448,426,261, or more than 100 per cent. In 1870 it amounted to $1,167,731,697, being an increase during the decade of $279,429,096, or less than 32 per cent. In 1884 the taxable property of the State amounted to $1,673,144,081, being an increase during the fourteen years of less than 44 per cent. (Official Statistical Report for 1884, page 655.)

The lands of Ohio, not including town lots, were valued on the books of the auditor of State, in 1850, at $266,751,102. In 1860, these lands were valued at $492,593,587, being an increase during ten years of $225,842,587, or 84 per cent. In 1884, they were valued at $708,312,772, being an increase in the twenty-four years of $215,719,185 or less than 44 per cent. During the last eight years, while the assessments have increased more than $100,000,000 there has been no increase in the value of lands, notwithstanding many millions of dollars have been expended in their improvement.

Since 1846 there has been no important change in the methods of valuing real or personal property in Ohio. All the changes which have been made have been in the direction of securing fuller returns. All assessors are sworn to return property at its "true value in money."

In 1850 the live-stock of Ohio was valued at $34,432,189. In 1860 it was valued at $69,583,000. The increase was $35,150,811. In 1880 the value was $69,583,000. The increase was in twenty years only $9,990,484. It was more than three and a half times as much between 1850 and 1860 as it was between 1860 and 1880.

In 1860, with 6,246,871 acres of improved land in Missouri, the valuation of the lands of that State was $232,821,716. In 1884, with nearly 17,000,000 acres of improved land, the lands of the State were valued at $244,262,931. The increased valuation of all the lands of Missouri in twenty-four years was only $11,441,215, or less than 1 per cent., although the increase of improved land was nearly 200 per cent.

By the assessed valuations, published in the census reports, the per capita wealth of the people of Indiana was $205 in 1850, and in 1860, $304. The increase in ten years was $99. In 1880, it was $367. The increase in twenty years was only $62. In 1850, the per capita wealth of Ohio was $222. In 1860, it was $379. The increase during ten years, $157; the increase during the next twenty years was just $100, or not two-thirds as much as it was in the previous ten years.

Without wearying you with further figures, do not all these statistics point strongly, if not conclusively, to the fact that from some cause or causes, there has been, since 1860, a great arrest in the prosperity of the country, and especially of those engaged in agriculture? Are not the statistical figures I have given such as to demand at the hands of your committee a careful and disinterested inquiry into the subject? There seems every reason to believe that between 1850 and 1860 there was a very rapid increase in wealth.

In the general prosperity of the country, the great farming community appears to have fully participated. Then, as now, it comprised about half of all our people. Starting in 1850 with less than $4,000,000,000, they increased their wealth by more than an equal amount in ten years. But since 1860, with far more than twice as much capital, and added millions of persons employed, they have scarcely been able, even by the highest estimates the census officers could possibly make, to add as much to their wealth in twenty years as they did in the preceding ten. In 1860 farmers owned half of the wealth of the country. In 1880 they owned but a quarter. By the census estimates, the other half of the community between 1860 and 1880 increased their wealth by more than $23,000,000,000. But farmers starting with an equal capital increased their wealth during the same time only a little more than $4,000,000,000.

No one is better aware than you that between 1850 and 1860 we had the lowest tariff that we have had for more than seventy years. And you are equally well aware that since 1860 we have had, almost all the time, the highest tariff we have ever had. Is there not good reason to believe that in that fact is to be found the secret of the terrible blight which has fallen on American agriculture?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the question is on the motion of Mr. PUGSLEY, of Ohio, to strike out the section placing wool on the free-list. I support that motion and I have no apology to offer for my position. I do it in the interest of a great interest in my district. I do it as a representative of all the people of my district, and in doing so I represent a great interest not alone of Republicans but of Democrats as well. And I claim for myself that I am quite as ready to do such battle as I may be able for all the people of my district alike. When it comes to a question like this the interest of the whole people should be paramount to partisan considerations.

But, Mr. Chairman, no matter how the question involved in the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGSLEY] may be turned and shaped, it is a political question as here presented. I am glad the time has come that in the State which I have the honor in part to represent there can be no longer any dodging or shifting of position on the part of the gentlemen who represent the Democracy.

When I heard the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] to-day I was reminded that he had made some progress in the development of a tendency toward the support of free wool. My mind runs back to the days in Ohio when fierce battles were waged on the stump and in the press and when Republican speakers were denounced as falsifiers of the record because they warned the people of Ohio that the tendency of the Democratic party was in the direction of free wool.

In their platform of 1883 they denounced the intimation of the Republican press and leaders of the Republican party and fiercely proclaimed in language that I will reproduce that the Democratic party of Ohio defended protection of the wool interest of that State.

In their platform of 1883 they denounced the lowering of the wool duties as follows:

> The act of the Republican Congress reducing the tariff on wool, while at the same time increasing it on woolen goods already highly protected, was iniquitous legislation * * * and ought to be corrected.

Later on, as late as 1885, after the present Administration had come into power, the Democratic party again, in August of that year, reasserted its fealty and loyalty in support of the wool tariff in language which I will also produce:

> The Democratic party is and always has been the party of the people and of the agricultural and wool-growing interests.

And in that same year there was circulated in Ohio a little circular, sent out by the Democratic headquarters at Columbus, affirming the loyalty of the Democratic party to the protection of wool and assailing the Republican party, and notably attacking the record of Senator SHERMAN, on that record, asserting that it was the Republican party in the Senate of the United States that had made possible the attack upon wool interest of the State of Ohio and of the country.

In that circular the Democratic party of Ohio placed itself on record in opposition to the position of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], when he claimed that the reduction of the tariff on wool will enhance the value in the market. In that circular the Ohio Democracy said:

> It means the indorsement of the reduction of the tariff on wool, by which measure the wool-growers of Ohio have been robbed of millions of dollars.

This is quite a different statement from that of my Ohio friend. It is due to the truth of history to say that the attack upon Senator Sherman was a false, wicked, and malicious statement, and known to be such by the men who made it. Senator Sherman fought in that contest, as he has in all others, for the interests of the wool-growers and farmers, and his record in this regard will grow brighter and brighter when his maligners and traducers are forgotten, or remembered only to be condemned.

When I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] make the speech he did I was reminded of an incident in the Forty-ninth Congress, one which made a profound impression on my mind, and one made use of in the campaign in Ohio to injure the position of the Republican party and strengthen the position of the Democratic party. There was pending in Congress the Morrison bill, which did not put wool on the free-list but provided a horizontal reduction of the tariff only in a small degree. There came from Ohio a great delegation of wool-growers, headed by the president of the Ohio Wool-Growers Association, and also by a strong representation of Democratic workers and the secretary of the same organization.

Under their leadership twenty members of Congress from Ohio assembled in the lobby of the House of Representatives. All the Democratic members were there. My distinguished predecessor, General Warner, was there. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SENEY], who sits before me and who does me the honor to listen to me now, was also there. The gentleman from the central district of Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] was also there. Also all the Democratic members, and all the Republican members, except the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who was unavoidably absent, but whose position did not need any reaffirmation on that question, for he is always for protection to Ohio and all the other States. In solemn column we marched to the Ways and Means Committee room. That organization had not yet invented the star-chamber process of incubating tariff bills. That committee had not withdrawn itself into a cloister to produce an attack on the industrial interests of the country. They had not progressed so far in that direction, and they were willing to hear from the representatives of the people. We went in there.

The Democrats selected General Warner to speak for them, and the Republicans selected myself. General Warner made a speech in which he denounced in strong language any attempt to reduce the tariff on wool. He said the wool industry in the State of Ohio had stood the last possible reduction that it could stand and be saved from utter destruction. From this strong language no dissent was made by the gentleman from the central district of Ohio, or by any other Democrat. I insisted that the position of the Republican party on wool was in favor of the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867, and I supported our position as well as I could, and there was no dissent heard to what I said. The members of Congress from Ohio came from the room of the Committee on Ways and Means conscious of having done their duty, both sides saying we had represented not only the Republicans but the Democratic sentiment of the State of Ohio, and all insisting that Ohio in both parties was unalterably opposed to any reduction on the wool tariff.

Two years have passed away, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from the central district of Ohio has changed front materially. But I ought to say that in the campaign that followed the slaughter of the Morrison tariff bill, my friend made a most energetic and persistent canvass in Ohio, and, in my mind's eye, I can see him now gallantly riding among the "haw-eaters" of Hocking County and the hardy agriculturists and wool-growers of Perry County, declaring that his position on the wool tariff had been defined, when, in company of MCKINLEY, and Warner, and Judge TAYLOR, and other distinguished representatives of the protection of the wool interest, he gave his voice in protest against a reduction or alteration of the tariff on wool. So he secured the votes of his district and made a successful canvass. The Democratic wool men were happy and so was everybody else. But now he has changed front, as near as I can tell from his speech, I repeat.

What has caused it? I do not desire to be personal in my remarks; and I ought to say in this connection that I notified my colleague that I should refer to this subject, and he told me that he must go from the House upon a matter of important business. He is the only Representative of the Democracy of Ohio that not only has changed front, but is proud of having done so. Other Representatives of the Democracy from Ohio re taking this enforced "dish of crow," but they are doing it in silence. [Laughter.] How well they like it I do not know, and what the effect upon them at the fall election will be I can not say [laughter], but I refer to my colleague from the central district because he not only takes his dish of crow, but deliberately turns around and asserts that he always liked crow and always takes it in that form. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

This year the Ohio Democracy in State convention assembled, with their record before their eyes, with the whole history of their false and fraudulent pretenses staring them in the face, and with the destruction of Ohio wool as a paying business assured, in their State platform comes out in strong language for the Mills bill, and free trade in wool. The Ohio delegation here, forgetting their position of two years ago, will, as I learn, all vote for free wool with only the honorable exception of my colleague, Mr. FORAN.

So the Democratic party of Ohio, following the Democracy of the country, and bowing to the fierce demand of the sectional committee of the House and the free-trade message of Mr. Cleveland, is for free wool. It is not important to discuss the question whether the Democrats are for free trade in general; it is enough to say that the whole party, headed by the President, is a free-trade party in wool.

What has been and what will be the effect of free wool upon the industry?

There has been and is now much confusion on this subject growing out of the multiplicity of authorities upon the effect of the decrease of the wool tariff on the industry in Ohio.

I produce here a table from Ohio statistics of 1868, with the introductory matter, as follows:

> Sheep-raising in Ohio has increased very rapidly, and we have now a much larger number than any State in the Union. The number and value in 1868 are as follows:

Number of sheep	7,688,845
Value of same	$14,819,353
Average value	$1.92

This shows an increase of 133,338 in the number of sheep. The number in a series of years was as follows:

1840	2,028,404
1850	3,942,916
1854	4,845,189
1860	3,368,174
1861	3,934,763
1862	4,448,227
1863	5,560,318
1865	6,395,796
1866	7,039,885
1867	7,555,508
1868	7,688,845

The wool clip in Ohio for 1868 was 24,848,624 pounds, being an increase over 1867 of 3,355,577 pounds.

In this year, the third of the reign of Mr. Cleveland, the flocks of Ohio have fallen to 4,101,340.

I can not better discuss the question of how the changes in the tariff have affected wool than to reproduce some extracts from my own speech made April 30, 1888, in this House during the present discussion:

But, Mr. Chairman, I was speaking of wool. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], candid man that he is, brave man as he is, too, to fight the industries of his State, destroy the best products of her magnificent growth in order that he may keep step with the reactionary Democracy, fell into the same mistake into which so many have fallen in regard to the effect that the changes of the tariff have had upon the wool production of the country. And, Mr. Chairman, I append here a statement which exactly illustrates the difficulty into which my friend fell. I give the table and will comment upon it:

"FACT AND FICTION ABOUT WOOL.

"The following tables are from the Pittsburgh Post, and are intended to show that sheep-raising in the States named has declined after twenty years of high tariff:

1860—Low tariff:
- Sheep in Pennsylvania....1,631,540
- Sheep in Ohio....3,546,767
- Sheep in New York....2,617,855
- Prices—
  - Fine....56 to 60 cents.
  - Medium....45 to 50 cents.
  - Coarse....40 to 42 cents.

1887—High tariff:
- Sheep in Pennsylvania....1,094,323
- Sheep in Ohio....4,562,913
- Sheep in New York....1,579,866
- Prices—
  - Fine....33 to 34 cents.
  - Medium....37 to 38 cents.
  - Coarse....33 to 35 cents.

Some of the results:
- Decrease of sheep in three States after twenty years' high prices....559,060
- Decrease in prices—
  - Fine wool....23 to 26 cents.
  - Medium wool....8 to 12 cents.
  - Coarse wool....7 cents.

"Now, the facts are exactly the reverse, if the cunning arithmetician of the paper had put them in their proper place, as follows:

	Low tariff, 1860.	High tariff, 1883.	Low tariff, 1888.
Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,631,540	1,803,336	984,891
Sheep in Ohio	3,456,767	5,050,541	4,106,622
Sheep in New York	2,617,855	1,732,332	1,564,067
Totals	7,706,162	8,586,209	6,655,580

"In 1883 the tariff was reduced so as to allow the yarn and goods (namely, worsted) which require the wool of these particular States for their production to come in at a lower figure than we can make them at home.

"SOME OF THE RESULTS.

Increase of sheep in three States after twenty years of high protection. 880,047
Decrease of sheep in three States after four years reduced tariff..... 1,050,582

"If worsted yarns and wools were restored to their position under the law of 1867 their importation would stop, our home mills get to work, and the wools of these three States be again in demand at such prices as would make sheep-raising profitable and result in a very great increase of their flocks.

"The decreased price was caused by the decreased demand. The reduction from 1860 to 1883 was a natural result of increased production under a high tariff, and sheep-growers were satisfied with the prices or they would not have added to their flocks. As a result of the tariff of 1883, however, the price declined to the ruinous figures which caused the decrease in the clip, and to that reduction only is the decrease due, and not to twenty years of high tariff, as claimed in the article quoted."

He avails himself of the figures which show the number of sheep in 1860 in certain of the sheep-growing States. Then he takes the figures of 1887 and gives prices, etc., but he forgot to divide this scope of time from 1860 to 1887 into three periods, and thereby hangs an absolute demonstration of the fact that figures will lie. It appears that under the low tariff the total number of sheep in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York was 7,706,162, and that under the high tariff up to 1883 they had increased to 8,586,209. Then, following the reduction of 1883, which was the first blow delivered upon the sheep-growing interest of this country by the Democratic party, the sheep fell down to 6,655,580. This straightens out my friend's figures and relieves him from the singular position that he got himself into. I append here the prices of wool under three classifications as given by George W. Bond & Co., of Boston, under the tariff of 1868 to 1883 and then from 1884 to 1886, inclusive:

Average prices under the free tariff.

Year.	Fine.	Medium.	Coarse.	Average.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1868	37	36	35	36
1869	37	35	30	34
1870	36	35	33	35
1871	43	42	41	42
1872	64	62	58	61
1873	64	56	52	57
1874	49	47	41	46
1875	48	48	41	46
1876	42	43	37	41
1877	40	37	30	36
1878	45	48	31	43
1879	34	35	31	33
1880	47	47	43	46
1881	45	46	38	33
1882	42	45	35	41
1883	42	44	35	40
Average prices under the reduced tariff.
1884	37	34	30	33
1885	34	32	28	33
1886	34	35	35	35

These figures tell the whole story, and demonstrate the fact that figures, while they may be made to lie, nevertheless very often spoil the force of the most impetuous argument. The wool-growers of this country are intelligent people, and they are not petitioning Congress at this time to restore the tax of 1867 without knowing what it is they are talking about. The effect of the reduction of 1883 upon the wool industry is better shown in the table which I now append, which shows the number of sheep in each group of States from 1880 to 1887, and the rise and fall of the industry. The States are grouped, first, reading downward, the whole United States, then the Western States, then the Southern States, then the Pacific coast, then the Territories and the Middle States, then the New England States. And this table, Mr. Chairman, exhibits in language more eloquent than I can use the effect that the tariff of 1867 had in stimulating the wool industry and the reduction of 1883 had in prostrating it:

Table showing the number of sheep in each group of States, 1880-1887.

The rate of increase, as shown by this exhibit, from 1878 to 1883 was 7 per cent. per annum. Projecting that ratio of increase through the years 1883 to 1887, we should have had for 1884 52,300,000; for 1885, 56,000,000; for 1886, 59,900,000; for 1887, 64,000,000; while, in fact, Mr. Chairman, the total number of sheep in 1887 was but, in round numbers, 44,000,000; a loss, as compared with the undoubted situation had the change not taken place, of 20,000,000 of sheep. Thus the small reduction of the tariff revenue has depleted the wool industry to the extent of 20,000,000 of sheep. And if that be true, what will be the effect of putting wool on the free-list?

There are 700,000 flock-owners in the United States. In 1850 we had but 21,000,000 sheep in the United States. In 1860, after ten years of Democratic administration, we had but 22,000,000 sheep. In 1870 we had 29,000,000; in 1880, in round numbers, 44,000,000; in 1883, 50,000,000, or more than double what we had in 1860. This industry furnished employment for 1,200,000 men. It employed more than $500,000,000 of capital, and was producing a product of about 3 per cent. net. Strike down this industry, and you destroy $500,000,000 of the wealth of the country only in so far as the carcasses of the sheep reduce the grand aggregate of destruction.

Mr. Chairman, under a Democratic administration, with wool on the free-list, substantially, I have seen in my own district thousands and tens of thousands of sheep slaughtered in the fall of the year for their hams and pelts. They were worth but a little over 50 cents a head, and there was but little profit on them at that price. I have seen this industry spring up as though touched by the lamp of Aladdin; I have seen intelligent farmers of my district search the world for improved breeds of sheep, and I have seen the flocks dotting the hillsides, grazing in the valleys, thriving and prospering everywhere. There was music in the friendly appeal of the sheep as it came "dumb before her shearers" and deposited in the treasury of the farm her fleecy contribution to the general prosperity of the country. I have seen this tide of industrial prosperity checked; it rose no higher; it stood still; it began to ebb, but it reached a point where if it could be let alone the farmer could live; the farmer could do something with it.

But I have seen the ruthless Democratic party, instigated thereto, as I am compelled to believe, by a spirit of envy and hostility to the section where the sheep industry has grown and prospered, lift its vandal hand and hold over the industry a sword more threatening than the fabled sword of Damocles. I have seen these flocks growing smaller and smaller, in many instances fading away; I have seen the farmer with blanched cheeks read of the assaults upon his industry by the Chief Magistrate of this nation, who was under an oath to God to administer his mighty office in the fear of the Almighty and for the benefit of the people of the whole country, and as I speak to-day, Mr. Chairman, the representatives of millions of dollars of this kind of property stand with their ear, figuratively, at the telegraph, as in the olden days when listening to ascertain how far north the flood of rebellion was coming, how near to Nashville the army of Hood had made its bloody track, how near to Cincinnati and Louisville the columns of Bragg and Kirby Smith had proceeded, how far into Pennsylvania the great army of Lee had come. So stand these farmers listening, listening, and their question is, How near to the farms of Ohio has the free-trade column of destruction advanced? Where is MILLS, with his spirit of destruction? How near is this vandal horde, with their weapons of inevitable disaster to the flocks in the fields of the wool-growers of the country?

Business is paralyzed, nobody will buy wool, nobody will raise sheep, nobody will trust in the hands of the Democratic party an industry so delicate, so grand, so intimately connected with the best interests of the agriculturists of this country as this. But pass this bill, Mr. Chairman, and I will tell you what they will do. The spirit of 1861 is not dead north of the Ohio River, and they will accept your assault upon that industry as a declaration that, with the Democratic party permanently in power, the people of the North are to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the benefit of the people of the South; that the old cry to which I adverted in the early part of my speech, that our people are "small-fisted farmers and greasy mechanics," the "mud-sills of society," is again the dominating voice of the Democratic party. They have a weapon in their hands, and they know how to use it. That weapon in the hands of the freeman comes down—

"As snow-flakes fall upon the sod,
But execute the freeman's will as lightnings do the will of God."

They will drive from power this Democratic party, and they will re-establish the old Republican party that, through its benign legislation, built up these industries and made this land blossom like the rose.

After the publication of the figures above it was not necessary that our friends on the other side should now become lost in the various labyrinthine compilations with which we have been tortured during the last three months.

In the official report of the Ohio agricultural department, published only yesterday, it is shown that the wool clip of Ohio, as compared with the average for the past five years, is only 77 per cent.

I want to say here that I have no time to spend in an elaborate and philosophic argument upon the question involved. It is enough for me to know that in 1860 we had in Ohio a trifle over 2,000,000 sheep, and that in 1868 we had increased this to the enormous number of 7,608,485. This increase went on until the reduction of 1883. But from that time on down to the present the wool industry of Ohio has gone steadily down, until to-day the latest reports of the flocks in Ohio show that we have only about 4,100,000.

But the gentleman from Ohio says: What about the increase and decrease and fluctuation of the cattle of Ohio, and the horses of Ohio, and the mules of Ohio? Well, Mr. Chairman, my friend exposes his imperfections in this line of discussion when he makes such an argument. Every industry in Ohio that prospers affects the horse industry. Every time a new farm is broken, it increases the production of cattle. Every time a new railroad is projected, it increases the demand for mules; and every time you open a new coal bank you want more transportation for your product; and the horses and mules and the cattle of Ohio are not used for a single purpose, but for a multiplicity of purposes, and increase or decline as the industries of the State demand. But the sheep of Ohio, with the simple unimportant matter of their use as food product, are used for the sole purpose of producing wool. So when you find that the sheep of Ohio have run down from 7,000,000 to 4,000,000, you find that they have become unprofitable for the purpose of producing wool, and there is no escape from that argument.

Now, I am not going to argue so much about the cause as the effect on this occasion. I find the wool product of Ohio is being sold to-day at somewhere in the neighborhood of 22 to 23 cents a pound. I have here an extract from the Barnesville Enterprise, published in the district of my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], in which it is stated that wool is selling in that neighborhood at 25 cents; that while it has not been active it will probably be purchased at about that figure. That two-thirds of the entire crop in that section has already been sold, and there has been a falling off in that township of about 1,000 sheep since last year.

One thousand sheep, Mr. Chairman, means $2,000 at the price, the average price, that the sheep of Ohio were estimated at last April.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Let me state that the editor and publisher of that paper is a firm Democrat.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He is, within my personal knowledge, a Democrat; but he voices the sentiment of Ohio when he recognizes the fact that there has been stricken from the product of the sheep of Ohio one-third of the value of the whole crop this year.

Now, before this debate closes, will not some Democrat tell the country how that has happened? What has done that? And if I charge that the country has paid all these millions of dollars, millions of dollars enough to have run the expenses of this Government for an almost indefinite time, for the luxury of having a Democratic Congress here, I want some Democrat to answer that question if he can. March right up to this issue and answer me. Do not go to flying off about "trusts" and "robber tariffs," and all that, but answer.

What makes the wool this year nearly one-third less in value than it was last year? Is it the general depression in the country?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. It is not one-third less in price this year than it was last year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman had given me his attention he would have observed what I have just read, that the wool crop in Ohio sold last year for thirty-five and is selling this year at from twenty-three to twenty-five.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. It is not so in Michigan.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I find it is substantially so in Boston, and everywhere else. The gentleman knows more about salt than I do; but he can not have a product in Michigan that is of the character of wool unaffected by the same processes that affect the wool of Ohio. We raise the same kind of wool. We go to the same market. Our men are just as capable of selling the wool as the men of Michigan; and when I read from the public prints a statement of the sales of wool in Ohio it was an argument that could not be met by such a statement. Ohio men are not selling their wool at less than its value.

Mr. JACKSON. I have a letter which corroborates the statement of the gentleman from Ohio—a letter from the president of the Pennsylvania Wool-Growers' Association.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The price to which I refer is the current price for the triple X wool.

Mr. DINGLEY. In corroboration of the gentleman's assertion, I will say I have a letter from a woolen manufacturer in Maine stating that he is buying his wool at from 7 to 8 cents less than last summer.

Let me present to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING] the following statement from Bradstreet, dated only yesterday:

WOOL MARKET.—THE MILLS BILL TRANSFERS ALL ACTIVE COMPETITION TO LONDON.

NEW YORK, July 13. [Special.]

Bradstreet's, in its review of the wool market, says: No increase of activity appears in the wool trade at any point. In the country holders are generally asking more than Eastern dealers are willing to pay. Until the course of the market is better developed buyers, both at first and second hands, bid fair to operate with the most caution.

While the manufacturers are preparing samples for light-weight goods, they are not yet bringing them out, and are uncertain about their future requirements in the way of stock. There is also a possibility that Congress will put wool on the free-list. In view of these circumstances no buying for future consumption is anticipated.

The most that the mills are doing, or seem likely to do for the present, is to take out additional supplies for running out goods already ordered. In Ohio and throughout the West generally there is comparatively little activity. A moderate increase in the movement of Michigan wool is reported. Shipments to some extent from the Territories are in progress.

An excellent attendance continues at the London sales, with active competition and a firm tone. The auctions close next Wednesday. Manufacturers have been looking through the Boston market in fair numbers this week, and have taken more or less new wool in order to test its quality. Buying for extensive consumption is still wanting.

A great deal of machinery is idle for repairs and orders. Prices are generally steady. Some inquiry for Michigan extra wool is noticed, and there is a moderate movement of new Territory stuff. Carpet wool is dull, but very firm. The receipts continue to run far below last year. Current quotations are as follows, with comparisons:

Grades.	July 16, 1886.	July 15, 1887.	July 13, 1888.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Ohio and Pennsylvania extra	33	32 to 33	27 to 28
Ohio and Pennsylvania XX	34 to 35	33 to 34	29
Ohio and Pennsylvania XX and above	35 to 36	34 to 35	29 to 30
Michigan extra	32	32 to 33	25½ to 26½
Fine Ohio delaine	35	36 to 37	30 to 31
No. 1 combing	38	38 to 40	35
Texas spring, twelve months	23 to 27	23 to 27	17 to 22

The sales of the week at Boston are reported at 2,871,500 pounds, as against 1,068,700 last week and 1,560,000 in the corresponding week a year ago. At Philadelphia wool is moving very slowly and mostly in small lots proportioned to the urgent wants of manufacturers.

The trade is unsettled by tariff uncertainties, and operators are anxiously awaiting a settlement of the question now before Congress.

Receipts are increasing a little, but are still small as compared with the arrivals at this period last year. The sales aggregate 483,000 pounds, as against 458,600 pounds last week, and 764,000 pounds for the corresponding week last year.

I put up these facts against the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING].

Mr. GROSVENOR. That, then, Mr. Chairman, is the reduction. Take the wool crop of Ohio and we will compromise. I say 10 cents; it may be 8 cents. Multiply every pound of wool produced in the United States this year by the figure 8 and point it off into dollars and cents and you will find out how much the farmers of this country have paid for the luxury of a Democratic Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has this Congress caused that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say the menace of the Mills bill has done just that.

Mr. SPRINGER. Ah!

Mr. GROSVENOR. Eight cents on 275,000,000 of wool amounts to $22,000,000, the reduction in a single year. Ohio produces about 25,000,000 pounds of wool this year. It has gone down fully 8 cents per pound, and that is $2,000,000 which we pay because we have a Democratic Congress and a free-trade President.

I hope the gentleman will go a little further and not sneer, because I can not stand his sneers; they are so extraordinary that they crush me. If he will go back to the time when the Republican party in this House, aided by all the Democrats in Ohio but one or two, struck out the enacting clause of the Morrison bill he will discover that the wool of the country sprang up within forty-eight hours in the markets of the country from 3 to 5 cents a pound. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. What fixes the price of wool?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have discussed that question here indefinitely and interminably. No two men on your side of the House put it the same way. It is fixed as other prices are fixed. Present value fixes it if the article is needed now; if the purchase is for future use, then prospective conditions affect, regulate, and control it.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. It is fixed by the wool buyers in the markets before they close the buying. They fix the price. After the clip is purchased the price of the wool is so increased that the farmer pays a much higher rate for his woolen goods than he receives for his wool.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I admit all that, and that is the strongest argument against you that can possibly be made. Your statements should be revised before you launch them into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is exactly the presence of these enactments here that makes it possible for the wool buyers to combine together, fix the price, and force the farmers of the country to sell it to them.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. They do it through the tariff; in no other way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Through the tariff?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes. You bring in bills assailing the protective laws and thus destroy prices, then you say the tariff did it—an argument on a par with the claim of the man who shoots his fellow-man and places the fault upon the gun.

Then the answer of the gentleman amounts to the claim that we must reduce the tariff when somebody threatens us, and if we refuse the injury is our fault.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. If they do not pay the high price made by the duty on imported wool they can pay a better price for the American clip.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will live a long time before he will be able to get rid of the combinations that form when legislation threatens an industry or product of this country.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Combinations could not form but for the tariff.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know they have a way of making the farmers of Michigan tremble in their boots by saying, "Look out; the Democratic party proposes to turn loose the illimitable wool product of Australia and South America free of duty upon our markets."

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The Democratic party do not make the farmers tremble in their boots.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want the gentleman in his own time—for I must confess with all due respect I am learning nothing—to tell me what has produced the situation in this country whereby the farmers are compelled to sell their wool at such a reduction. Let him do it in his own time; he will have plenty of time.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I can tell you now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If he says it is hard times, who brought them? I can remember that a few years ago it was the custom of gentlemen to charge hard times to the debit side of the ledger of the Republican party. I can remember very well whenever anybody failed in this country, no matter what the cause, the head-lines of the Democratic newspapers would show he had been "Shermanized;" so I think we can properly say now to these gentlemen, if they say the price of wool is run down because of hard times, who produced the hard times? My friend from Ohio, who represents with myself the Hocking Valley district and the great products of iron and coal, boasted to-day that already somebody had got in a charge that the Mills bill put iron and coal on the free-list. I hold in my hand an editorial from one of the leading Democratic newspapers of the day (the New York Sun), published under the head of "Wool is reached." I will print this editorial in my remarks. It is very short. The substantial effect of it is that when the President drew his original tariff message, which is to-day the platform of the Democratic party, he put on the free-list both iron and coal.

I do not know whether that is true or not. I do not care. I believe it is true, and I am told that in the first draught of the Mills bill iron ore and coal were both on the free-list, and I think I know that iron ore and coal is not now on the free-list because a delegation came here from Alabama and other Democratic States and notified the grand council of the Ways and Means Committee that if the change was not made there would be trouble on the Black Warrior, the Coosa, and elsewhere in the South: and so, for this reason and for no other reason, the assault is made first upon wool, and when that attack is successful iron ore and bituminous coal are to go next.

The editorial is as follows:

WOOL IS REACHED.

The consideration of the Mills bill in the House of Representatives has now reached the wool clause.

Free wool is regarded by the Mills forces, and we believe it was so regarded by Mr. Cleveland, as the king-post of the new tariff roof under which they propose that the country shall live until they can build a freer one. To demonstrate this statement, a very short consideration of Mr. Cleveland's message and of the history of the Mills bill will be sufficient.

It is universally understood that the first draught of the message showed several important staples upon the free-list which were not there finally. Coal and iron were on, among others, and the reason that they were removed was that such a programme would have been too startling and too comprehensive for practical use. Thus the recommendations actually submitted to Congress fell considerably short of the mark to which the President's policy would have gone had it been unrestrained by his estimate of the political difficulties in the way of attempting to go further.

The Mills bill has gone through the same moderating process in the Committee of the Whole, but it has been done publicly. Seventeen articles of import, which had been placed upon the free-list, have been taken off, and the statesmen particularly interested in their domestic production have been solidified for the assault upon the duty on wool. On many taxed articles higher duties have been imposed than those originally contemplated by the Mills bill. But wool is the key of the territory now in dispute between protection and free trade; and against it the free-trade brigade have been maneuvering to mass their entire force, volunteers and conscripts. They have yielded up one minor point after another with scarcely the sign of a struggle, all with the view of a combined and irresistible attack on wool.

As Mr. Webster said of Dartmouth College, "it is one of the lesser lights in the horizon of our country. You may put it out."

Nothing will be easier than to extinguish the wool interest, if you have votes enough; and then with the free-traders triumphant in the House of Representatives, a President in the White House whose economic policy consists primarily of tariff smashing, and a national condition of the finances which will make free trade easily and thoroughly practicable within twenty years or so, the protective system will be liable to come down by the run. Then statesmen like GAY of Louisiana or VANCE of Connecticut, to whose interests Mr. MILLS has specially, though we dare say only temporarily, surrendered his fundamental principle, will find that though they have saved their roof their foundation is gone.

The Mills tariff bill was in its conception and purpose a free-trade project. It has been immensely changed under the effect of discussion and of politics; but its pivotal element is still free wool.

It is for the interest of Democracy that the Mills tariff bill should be beaten.

Let the miners of the Hocking valley be not deceived. Their product is to come next. The hour is delayed; that is all.

But I know this: while I am glad, in the interest of my constituents, that coal and iron are for the present preserved from the destruction of the free-list, I will never cease to condemn the inconsistency of a committee that would dare to put wool on the free-list as a raw material and leave bituminous coal and iron ore protected. The only answer to this charge of inconsistency is the answer which was given frankly by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] in his opening speech in this debate. When confronted with this suggestion he said, "There are some things which we can do and there are some things which we can not do;" and I could have added for him, "There were some things which we dared to try to do, and there were some things we did not dare to try to do."

But the argument of this editorial is the argument which I adopt. We have reached wool, and that is to be stricken down. It would not do to attack the wool interest and the iron interest and the salt interest and the coal interest of this country all at once, and so these gentlemen, marching up here filled with a determination to ultimately obtain free trade, have reached wool, which they are going to put on the free-list, and, in the language of the New York Sun, a leading Democratic exponent of to-day, when they have accomplished that they will strike at the other great raw materials of the country, iron and coal.

One victory and the free-traders will be emboldened to assail other industries, and in the end all the Northern industries must go; and protection to all the Southern products will be increased.

Mr. Chairman, I insist upon this single proposition: The Congressional district which I represent has to-day about 300,000 sheep. One of the gentlemen who have argued vociferously here in favor of free wool spoke to me privately the other day and asked me whether many men in my district had more than 50 or 75 sheep. Why, Mr. Chairman, in a district of five counties, largely devoted to iron and salt and coal, there are nevertheless 300,000 sheep Their product ran up last year to nearly $500,000.

This year something over a hundred thousand dollars has been wiped out, and the future of the industry depends wholly upon the question whether or not the system of protection is to be maintained. The argument which was made some weeks ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], that the land of the country could not be used economically for the production of sheep and wool, exhibited a painful misunderstanding of the situation. In my district there are large tracts of valuable land, and I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that upon that land the sheep industry is not profitable. But there is in the same connection land constituting perhaps one-half the surface of the district, which is worth not exceeding $10 or $15 or $20 an acre, and it is worth that much only because 300,000 sheep are grazing upon it and getting their living upon it, and continuing the soil in at least as good condition at the end of the year as it was at the beginning.

Now take off the wool duty, destroy the wool industry, and you not only compel the wool-growers to seek another line of production, but you render that land substantially worthless, because it is practically worthless for any other purpose. That is a strong argument in favor of the wool tariff.

Among all the questions that have thronged upon us here in considering this bill we have the fact of the peculiar geographical character of this attack demonstrated in this wool item, and I want somebody sometime during this debate to tell us why it is they want to strike this protection down. I find in a publication which I hold in my hand, emanating from the Committee on Ways and Means, that this reduction will have the effect to reduce the value of wool and cheapen clothing in this country. On the other hand, I have the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], as I understood it, that the effect of this would be to make the product of sheep in this country more valuable.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am glad that the gentleman stands by his position. Now, between the two, I want some one to explain what is the object to be gained by this proposed change. This bill purports to cut down the revenue. Certainly no sane man will claim that we can afford, for the difference of $5,000,000 which we get from the tariff on wool, to assail an industry like this and destroy it. We have had a good many predictions during the progress of this discussion, and I will make one now. I understand that this bill is to be passed. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has told us prophetically that it is to pass this House, and that he hopes it will pass the Senate. And I say pass it! Strike down an industry owned and operated by a million of voters in this country; strike down an industry that feeds and clothes five million people; strike it down and come back here next December, cast your eyes about this House, and then I say to you you will "feel like one who treads alone some banquet-hall deserted."

The people of the country recognize this not only as an unnecessary blow at a valuable industry, but as a stepping stone to the attack upon all the other industries. Do not undertake to flatter yourselves that you are to fight this battle out with the sheep owners of this country alone. You are to fight it out with the men coming up everywhere, with ballots in their hands, representing all the kindred industries of this country which are to be taken one by one as fast as they are reached and consigned to the insatiable maw of the free-trade monster embodied in this bill. The people of this country understand that. They have watched this debate with wonderful interest; and they have seen no justification of this measure; they have heard no successful defense of it; and they will not hear any successful defense of it, because it is without necessity, without demand by the people—a gross attack upon a great industry which can stand no further reduction.

Mr. Chairman, no single industry of the American people can be wrongfully stricken down upon the demand of free-traders or their allies the destruction of which will not be revenged at the polls by every man who lives by an industry in this country, whether that industry is directly protected or otherwise. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, five years ago the Republican party of Michigan did not believe in the doctrine proclaimed by the Republican party of the nation to-day, favoring the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes rather than a surrender of any part of the protective system. That eminent Republican, James G. Blaine, in his essay called the "Paris Message," uses the following language:

The tax on whisky by the Federal Government, with its suppression of all illicit distillation and consequent enhancement of price, has been a powerful agent in the temperance reform by putting it beyond the reach of so many. To cheapen the price of whisky is to increase its consumption enormously. There would be no sense in urging the reform wrought by high license in many of the States if the National Government neutralizes the good effect by making whisky within the reach of every one at 20 cents a gallon.

The Republican platform favors the abolition of the whisky tax, which, as Mr. Blaine says, would cheapen its price and increase its consumption. But before that convention adjourned it passed a resolution sympathizing with "all wise and well-directed efforts for morality and temperance." They sympathize. How? According to Mr. Blaine they sympathize with temperance and morality by proposing to reduce the price of whisky.

In 1883 we were collecting an enormous surplus revenue. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, our receipts exceeded our ordinary expenditures by over $146,000,000; and in the early part of 1883 the question as to the reduction of taxes was being extensively agitated. The Republican party of Michigan had not at that time gone over "body and soul and breeches" to the "trusts" that are kept alive by the tariff, and they expressed themselves through their Legislature in square, honest, unmistakable terms against free whisky and tobacco in any form. The Michigan Legislature of 1883 was largely Republican in both branches; and fearing that the growing surplus in the Treasury might induce Congress to abolish the internal-revenue taxes in whole or in part, they passed a resolution which was approved by a Republican governor, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose any effort to repeal the taxes on whisky and tobacco.

That resolution passed the house of representatives on the 17th day of January, and the title of it was "Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote against the removal of the internal-revenue tax upon intoxicating liquors and tobacco, or either." That resolution passed the senate on the 2d day of February, and was approved by a Republican governor. That does not sound much like the utterances of the Republican party of to-day, whose policy, if carried to its logical and legitimate outcome, would result in adding to and increasing the misery of our fellow-citizens by placing whisky before them at 2 cents a drink. To this has it come at last. Why, sir, I remember reading once of a man who said that his ideal country would be a place where whisky sold for 20 cents a gallon and there was no hanging for stealing. It is very obvious, and therefore I will not state what party the gentleman I have just mentioned ought to belong to.

Has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's five minutes has expired.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move, by unanimous consent, the gentleman's time be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAIRD. With the understanding that the same courtesy shall be offered to this side from the other.

Mr. FORD. It has been offered to gentlemen on the other side, because they have taken up the whole afternoon.

There was no objection, and Mr. TARSNEY's motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has been extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. FORD. I thank the committee for its courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after favoring cheaper whisky the Republican convention denounced the Democratic party for proposing free wool. It is conceded on all hands, sir, there should be some reduction of taxation. Where should that reduction take place? Certainly upon the taxes most burdensome. Is the tax on whisky burdensome? There can be but one answer to that question from any man who has not been seduced by selfishness and blinded by partisanship.

There is not a government on the face of the globe that does not tax whisky. Is the battle-cry to be cheap whisky and higher tax on clothing? If so, it will never succeed. Is the wool tax burdensome? Of course it is. It is a burden to the consumer while at the same time it is no benefit to the wool-grower.

It is startling to observe the zeal gentlemen on the other side of the House exhibit in order to save the wool-grower, as they say, from harm. All over the country the manufacturers who receive bounty from this tariff are greatly exercised over the reduction of the wool duty. They, as well as their subsidized journals and political organs, have been crying out about what? Not about copper, not about iron, not about glass, but altogether about wool. When we reached the copper schedule in this House during the progress of the consideration of the Mills bill there was not a flutter; when we reached the iron schedule there was scarcely a breeze; but, sir, just the moment we touched wool there was a rushing cyclone from the other side, and even now gentlemen are tumbling over one another in the anxiety of their superabundant zeal to save the imperiled interests as they allege of the wool-grower in this country from total destruction by the effort to put wool on the free-list.

Some people might doubt the sincerity of these manufacturers, who are new converts to the farmer's interest, and might suppose they were more anxious for their own projects than for the interest of anybody else. It looks very much as if they were using the interest of the farmer as a mere cat's-paw to promote and establish their own interest.

Let us inquire just exactly how this matter is. Is it a fact that the wool tariff does help the farmer?

The facts before this House prove the contrary. I do not believe the tariff on wool raises the price of the farmer's product. I do not believe it ever yielded to the farmers of the country a single dollar or even a single penny of advance in the price for which their wool sold in the markets. The price of wool depends upon the prosperity of the woolen manufacturer. He must be prosperous or there will be no demand for the wool of the farmer, and if the demand for the wool of the farmer be lessened, of course, the price depending upon the demand for it and the market being reduced or cut off, the price falls.

Our woolen manufacturers can not depend altogether upon the production of wool in this country. We can not produce the different kinds of wool in the United States necessary for successful manufacture of all sorts of woolen clothes from the lowest to the highest. For their success they must have within their control all kinds of wool. When they are successful their demand for the wool product of our own farmers is of course steady and increasing.

George William Bond, the greatest authority on wool and wool manufactures in the United States, uses this language:

None of the third-class wools (carpet wools) can be grown in this country to advantage.

In regard to fine wools, he says:

We may grow wool in some places equally fine and apparently as good in other respects as the wools that are imported, but they will not produce the same effect when finished. Such is the influence of climate and soil upon wool that no two places can grow wool exactly alike.

Now, you may put on protective tariff just as you please on wool, you may make it as high as you please, but we can not, however much we establish protective tariff in this country, raise the different sorts of wool necessary for our woolen manufacturers, because the Almighty has not given us the soil or climate with which to do it. Therefore, when you increase the price of the foreign wool you necessarily impose an additional burden upon the woolen manufacturer; but when you do that, instead of helping the farmers of [illegible] country, you only injure the farmers, because by imposing additional burdens upon the woolen manufacturers, who are the very best customers of the wool products of the farmers in this country, you therefore reduce the demand in our markets for the farmer's wool, and the demand being lessened I need not tell this House the price falls.

If the woolen manufacturing interest is depressed the demand is lessened and the price is reduced. That is as certain as that two and two make four or the shadow follows the substance. So true is it that the tariff on wool cheapens the price that the proposition has been denounced over and over again by leading Republicans. In 1883 the National Wool Growers' Association declared that the act of 1867, whereby the wool tariff had been increased, steadily, year by year, it reduced the price of wool from 51 cents in 1867 to 43 cents at the present time.

The Indiana Wool-Growers' Association in 1883 said:

The price of wool has steadily receded from 51 cents in 1867 to 42 cents in 1883.

Senator HAWLEY, in the Senate of the United States, in 1883, said that the effect of the wool tariff had been—to reduce the price of wool.

And Senator SHERMAN also, in the Senate, in the same year, said:

The result of the policy of protecting the wool-grower has been to gradually reduce the price.

In 1857 the tariff upon wool was reduced, so much so that we had practically free wool. In 1867 the tariff was put up to almost the highest rate of tariff we have ever had on wool. What was the result? For the three years following 1857, under free wool, the price of wool in Boston was 44 cents a pound on an average; and for the three years following the high tariff of 1867 it was 36 cents a pound.

Again, in 1872 the wool tariff was reduced 10 per cent. Did this reduction decrease the price of wool? No, sir; by no means; for in 1872, under a reduction of this percentage of the wool tariff, wool sold in Boston at an average price during the year of 62 cents in gold, the very highest price ever known for wool on this continent.

Now, some one said that the wool tariff increases the number of sheep.

A MEMBER. Makes more lambs live.

Mr. FORD. They claim that it not only raises the price of wool, but that it actually makes the sheep grow. Let us look into this for a moment.

What was our proportion of sheep to population before we had any tariff upon wool? Why, it was a great deal larger than it is to-day. In 1813, years before we had any tariff on wool, and at a time when we had 8,000,000 of population, we had 15,000,000 sheep, while in 1887, with a population numbering 60,000,000, we had but 44,000,000 sheep. In 1813 we had two sheep per capita, while in 1887 we had but four-fifths of a sheep to each person, not enough to go round and give every person one whole sheep. Now, the result is 100 per cent. more sheep under free wool, better prices under free wool, and greater prosperity.

From 1824 down to 1860 there was no time when we did not have a tariff on wool. The result was that the number of sheep declined enormously per capita of population. In 1857 the tariff on wool was reduced, so that we had practically free wool; but in 1861 the tariff was again raised.

In 1860 we had three years of practically free wool, but the wool-growing industry had not yet recovered from the blight produced by nearly forty years of high tariff, so that our proportion of sheep to population was very low. In 1860 we had 30,000,000 of population and 22,000,000 of sheep, exactly the relative proportions of to-day; and in 1860 the price of wool in Boston averaged 48 cents a pound, while in 1886 it was but 33 cents a pound, showing that since 1860, notwithstanding the imposition of an exorbitant tariff, the number of sheep per capita has not increased, while the price of wool has actually declined 15 cents a pound.

Now we are told, Mr. Chairman, that the object of imposing a high tariff on wool is to reduce the importations of foreign wool. But it does not, because our manufacturers have got to have the foreign wool that we do not produce or else they will close their factories and go out of the business. The wool tariff has not reduced the importations of wool at all scarcely, or to any extent worth speaking of.

In 1866, out of a total consumption of wool by the people of the United States, 30 per cent. was foreign wool, and in 1886, 29 per cent. was foreign wool.

Gentlemen say that the number of sheep increased in this country between 1869 and 1884 at a greater rate than ever before, and they attribute it to the tax on wool. Sir, where did that increase occur? Not in Ohio; not in Michigan. That increase was west of the Missouri River; it was in Texas, in California, in New Mexico. Was it the tariff that increased the number of sheep in those States? Not at all; it was the cheap land that could be procured, on which the sheep could roam and graze.

The number of sheep in Michigan in 1870 was 1,985,906. In a former speech I was misled by some erroneous statistics and stated the number at 4,000,000. That was a mistake. There were 1,985,906 in Michigan in 1870. The number of sheep in Michigan in 1887 was 2,156,157, or an increase of only 170,251 in seventeen years. The population of that State during that time increased 69 per cent., and the number of sheep increased but 8 per cent.

Now observe the difference under low tariffs. Between 1850 and 1860, under a low tariff, and part of the time free wool, the number of sheep in Michigan increased 70 per cent. Between 1860 and 1870, during which time there were only three years of a high tariff on wool, the number of sheep increased 56 per cent.

So long as suitable land for grazing sheep can be had in the West almost for the asking, the wool coming from that portion of our domain will prove a mighty competitor with the wool grown on high-priced land in Michigan and Ohio. If you are going to benefit the Michigan wool-grower by a tariff, that tariff should be against Texas, California, and the Territories, and not against South America or Australia.

Now, I would like to know where is the benefit to the farmer in this? It exists only in the vivid imagination of gentlemen on the other side. Has the wool tariff reduced the importation of wool? No, sir. I answer emphatically it has not. Has it increased the number of sheep? Not at all.

Mr. TARSNEY. It has decreased them.

Mr. FORD. Has it increased the price of wool? No, sir; the opposite has been the effect; the price has actually declined. Then where is the benefit to the farmer? It must be in the supreme satisfaction that he is doing hard work in order that certain manufacturers may grow rich out of his labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The manufacturer has said to the farmer: "You work; I eat. You toil; I take a rest. You struggle and economize and pinch and save money and give it to me; and, Mr. Farmer, while you are making that donation to our wealth and prosperity you must be comforted by the consoling thought that there is a tariff on wool." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is the feast the farmers of the United States are invited to partake of by the Republican party; but it is a feast that, in my judgment, they will utterly repudiate and reject on the 6th of November next. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1676, and that it be now considered in the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10165) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River in Texas, and that the same be now considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOVEY. I object.

Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and that the same be now considered.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1211) for the completion of the monument to Mary the mother of Washington at Fredericksburgh, Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOVEY. I object.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There have been night sessions set apart for the consideration of bills coming from a number of committees. Quite a number of bills that have been reported from the Committee on War Claims have passed the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that next Wednesday night one week be set apart for the consideration of bills that have passed the Senate and been reported to the House by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOVEY. I object.

Mr. McMILLIN. As it seems that no business can be done, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House accordingly took a recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. The House was called to order by Mr. COX, as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 14, 1888.

SIR: Hon. S. S. COX is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read also the order for this evening session.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. LANHAM,

Ordered, That a recess be taken to-morrow (Saturday) evening from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims to which there shall be no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, before moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills under the special order, I desire to submit a brief statement for the consideration of the House. There are, I think, about one hundred and fifty bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. A great many of those bills are, in my judgment, quite meritorious, and will provoke very little, if any, discussion. Under the order of the House we can consider only such bills as may not be objected to. It would require a great deal of time to call the bills regularly in their order on the Calendar, and I submit a request for unanimous consent that when the House does resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House gentlemen present may call up bills out of the regular order for consideration.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some objection to the method proposed by the gentleman from Texas, and, with his permission, I suggest that the most satisfactory plan that has ever yet been devised for facilitating business at these evening sessions is to have the bills read by their titles, and if the consideration of any bill is not asked for when its title is read to let it go over, not losing its place on the Calendar. In this case, however, in view of the special order, I would modify that so as to provide that each member shall have the right to ask for the consideration of only one bill until other members present shall each have had an opportunity to have one bill considered.

Mr. LANHAM. There are several gentlemen here whose bills are low down on the Calendar, so that it would take a long time to reach them, and I think that those who have been diligent enough to make their appearance here to-night ought to receive some consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I concur fully in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has said. Various methods have been tried for the consideration of bills at these sessions, but I think the most satisfactory one we have ever adopted is the one suggested by him. Let the bills on the Calendar be called in their order, and if no gentleman present calls for the consideration of a bill when the title is read let it be passed over informally, not losing its place on the Calendar; but if any gentleman present desires the consideration of the bill, let him ask for it and let the bill be considered. I think we shall do more business in that way than in any other, and it will be satisfactory to every one.

Mr. LANHAM. I suggest that no member ought to be allowed to call up a bill for an absentee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let it be understood that no one shall be permitted to call up more than one bill until all gentlemen present have each had an opportunity to call up a bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there seems to be some objection to the method of procedure proposed by myself, I will endeavor to conform to the suggestions of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, under the special order which has been read in the House. The Chair will entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bills be read by their titles in their order on the Calendar, and that when a bill is reached, unless some gentleman present calls for its consideration, it shall be passed over informally, not losing its place on the Calendar, each member present having the right to call up only one bill until others present have had a like opportunity to call up each one bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that gentlemen watch the Calendar closely while the Clerk reads the bills by their titles only, so that as bills are called the consideration of which is not asked for they may be rapidly passed over. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of Zeb Ward.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have that bill considered.

Mr. LANHAM. That bill passed the Senate, came to the House, and was referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims had previously reported the House bill, but they have since reported the Senate bill with the recommendation that the House bill be laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS. I intended as soon as the title of the bill was announced to ask the consideration of the Senate bill instead.

ZEB WARD.

The first bill on the Calendar from the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. ROGERS) was the bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of Zeb Ward.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that, instead of considering this House bill, we consider Senate bill No. 321, which is an exact copy of this.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Senate bill will be considered in lieu of the House bill. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 321) for the relief of Zeb Ward, of Little Rock, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Zeb Ward, of Little Rock, Ark., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $19,615, balance of the account of said Ward for the keeping of United States prisoners in the State penitentiary of Arkansas from April 1, 1876, to March 31, 1883, the said Ward being the lessee of said penitentiary during that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? The Chair hears no objection, and the committee will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to hear the report read.

Mr. ROGERS. The report is somewhat lengthy. I will send it up to be read if the reading is insisted upon, but I can state the facts perhaps more briefly than they are stated in the report, though that presents, I think, the best argument which can be made on the subject.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims have considered Senate bill No. 321, for the relief of Zeb Ward, and report the same without amendment, and recommend its passage.

This bill is the same as House bill No. 68, reported from this committee January 24, 1888, and the report thereon of that date (No. 110) is adopted as a report on this Senate bill.

The committee recommend that said House bill do lie upon the table, and that Senate bill No. 321 be passed instead thereof.

Mr. ROGERS. This report refers to the very elaborate report upon the House bill which of course ought to be read, if gentlemen wish to hear the committee's statement of the case.

Mr. LONG. Why can not the gentleman from Arkansas state the case?

Mr. ROGERS. I can state it accurately; but the reading of the report seems to be desired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will not insist upon the reading of this report, because I do not wish to appear captious; but in matters of such importance as this I think it proper the record should show the report upon which the action of the House is founded. I have acted on that theory heretofore, and shall continue to do so.

Mr. ROGERS. Let the report be printed in the RECORD, and I will make a statement which I think will cover the points involved.

Mr. KILGORE. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his demand for the reading of the report?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to hear the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee find that this bill was considered by the Committee on Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress and favorably reported, but the amount claimed being a considerable sum, the committee have carefully re-examined it and submit herewith the result thereof.

In the year 1873 Ward & Peck became the lessees of the Arkansas State penitentiary. At the date of their lease the United States prisoners in the eastern and western districts of Arkansas were being confined in that prison, at the sum of 75 cents a day per capita, which was the sum allowed by the State for keeping its prisoners in the county jails. Ward & Peck continued to receive and keep the prisoners for both districts of Arkansas upon the same terms and conditions as their predecessors had done. In a letter addressed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury to the United States marshal at Little Rock, dated August 19, 1884, in relation to the prisoners then kept at the Arkansas penitentiary, the following language was used:

"The sum of 75 cents per day will be allowed for guarding, subsisting, clothing, medicine, and providing medical attendance for each prisoner, in accordance with the rates heretofore allowed.

"R. W. TAYLER, Comptroller."

In October, 1874, complaints were made to the Attorney-General of the United States touching the condition and management of the penitentiary of the State of Louisiana, at Baton Rouge, in that State, whereupon the Attorney-General opened correspondence with the United States marshal, Isaac C. Mills, of Little Rock, Ark., touching the condition and management of the Arkansas penitentiary, and the propriety of confining the United States prisoners sentenced by the United States courts for the district of Louisiana therein. The following is the answer of the marshal:

"OFFICE OF UNITED STATES MARSHAL,
"EASTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS,
"Little Rock, Ark., November 7, 1874.

"SIR: Yours of the 29th October, in regard to confinement of convicts sentenced by the United States courts of the district of Louisiana, has been received; contents carefully noted. In reply I am of opinion that the Arkansas penitentiary is a suitable place for the purpose; Little Rock is a healthy locality; prison room for several hundred more convicts than they now have confined. The contractors, Messrs. Ward & Peck, are willing to contract at the same rates as are now paid them by the United States for like services.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

"ISAAC C. MILLS,
"United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

"Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
"Attorney-General, Washington, D. C."

On the receipt of this letter the Attorney-General wrote as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
"Washington, D. C., November 12, 1874.

"SIR: I have received your letter of the 7th instant, informing me that, in your opinion, the Arkansas penitentiary is a suitable place for the confinement of United States prisoners, that Little Rock is a healthy locality, and that there is prison room in the penitentiary for several hundred more convicts than are now confined there. You further note that the contractors, Messrs. Ward & Peck, will contract to receive convicts sentenced by Federal courts in other districts than those of Arkansas, at such rates as are now paid by the United States for prisoners sentenced by the courts of the latter named district.

"I have designated this penitentiary as a place for the confinement, subsistence, and proper employment of such convicts as may hereafter be convicted by the United States courts for the district of Louisiana, and have so notified the officers of that district. You will please have a contract drawn up to be signed by these contractors on the one part and by myself for the United States on the other part, conditioned upon the payment of the same sum as is now paid for the support and maintenance of the United States convicts in that prison, that they will safely keep, subsist, clothe, and furnish the necessary medical attendance and medicine for such prisoners as may be sent by the courts of the district of Louisiana.

"When the contract shall have been signed by the contractors you will transmit it to this Department for my signature.

"Very respectfully,

"GEO. H. WILLIAMS, Attorney-General.

"J. C. MILLS, Esq.,
"United States Marshal, Little Rock, Ark."

The contract was drawn and executed in pursuance of this letter, and is as follows:

"Articles of agreement made and entered into this 18th day of November, A. D. 1874, by and between Zeb. Ward and John M. Peck, partners under the style of Ward & Peck, lessees of the Arkansas State penitentiary, of the first part, and the United States of America by her Attorney-General, George H. Williams, of the second part.

"Whereas George H. Williams, Attorney-General of the United States of America, has designated the penitentiary of the State of Arkansas as a place for the confinement, subsistence, and proper employment of such convicts as may hereafter be convicted by the United States courts for the district of Louisiana—

"Witnesseth: That the said Ward & Peck, lessees as aforesaid, parties of the first part, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, have agreed and by these presents do covenant and agree to and with the said United States, party of the second part, that they, the said parties of the first part, shall and will safely keep, subsist, and clothe, and furnish the necessary medical attendance and medicine for all such prisoners as may be sent to the said penitentiary of the State of Arkansas by the courts of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

"And the said party of the second part doth hereby covenant and agree on her part that she will well and truly pay to the said parties of the first part the sum of 75 cents per day for each and every person so safely kept, subsisted, clothed, and furnished with medical attendance and medicine as aforesaid by said parties of the first part; said payment to be made at such times and upon the production of such vouchers as may be prescribed by the Department of Justice of the United States. And for the true and faithful performance of the covenants and agreements aforesaid the parties aforesaid hereby bind themselves firmly by these presents. In testimony whereof the parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and seals, and the United States, party of the second part, has witnessed her assent thereto by the hand of her Attorney-General.

"WARD & PECK, [L. S.]
"Lessees of Arkansas Penitentiary.

"[Seal Department of Justice.]

"GEO. H. WILLIAMS. [L. S.]

"In the presence of—
"JOHN WASSELL.
"C. B. MOORE.
"A. J. FALLS, as to GEO. P. WILLIAMS."

As soon as the contract had been completed the Attorney-General made the following order:

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, November 10, 1874.

"SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of the acts of Congress approved May 13, 1864, and March 5, 1872, I have designated the Arkansas State penitentiary as a place for the confinement, subsistence, and proper employment, during the term of their sentence, of all persons who shall have been or may hereafter be convicted in the courts of the United States for the district of Louisiana of crimes against the United States and sentenced by said courts to imprisonment at hard labor.

"Very respectfully, "GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
"Attorney-General.

"J. R. BECKWITH, Esq.,
"United States Attorney, New Orleans, La."

[NOTE.—Same sent to Judge Durell, at New Orleans, and Marshal Packard.]

After the date of this order the prisoners sentenced in the United States courts for the State of Louisiana were sent to the Arkansas State penitentiary and kept by its lessees under this agreement. In January, 1875, Ward, the claimant, purchased the interest of his co-partner, Peck, in the lease from the State and in the contracts aforesaid for keeping, subsisting, etc., the United States prisoners for the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, and thereby became the sole lessee of the State and the only contractor with the United States.

In the spring of 1875, only a few months after the said contract was executed, Mr. Ward, in conformity to established regulations of the Department of Justice under the law, presented his account for guarding, feeding, etc., the United States prisoners to the Hon. H. C. Caldwell, then and now the district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, for his examination and approval; whereupon the said judge approved the account for 50 cents per day per capita, and refused to approve it for the other 25 cents per day per capita, as provided in the contracts between the United States and the lessee, and wrote the Attorney-General a letter containing, among other things, the following paragraph, explanatory of his action:

"The prisoners sentenced to imprisonment in this penitentiary are sentenced to 'hard labor' during the term of their imprisonment. This part of the sentence is faithfully executed by the lessees of the penitentiary. The earnings of the prisoners' labor under this sentence go to the lessees. Their labor is valuable, and ought to be taken into consideration in fixing the compensation of the lessees for subsisting, clothing, and furnishing medical attendance to the prisoners. I am satisfied that 50 cents per day would be a most liberal compensation for subsisting, clothing, furnishing medical attendance, etc., for prisoners sentenced to hard labor, and their accounts ought justly to be reduced to that sum at least. For prisoners put in the penitentiary for 'safe-keeping,' and who do not labor, 75 cents per day is not unreasonable.

"HENRY C. CALDWELL,
"United States District Judge."

On the receipt of this letter the Attorney-General notified Mr. Ward that only 50 cents would be allowed. Ward protested against the violation by the United States of the contract. Correspondence ensued; but the Department continued to cut down the account from 75 to 50 cents, and to send the prisoners to Ward in a way hereafter explained, who received them, as he was compelled to do under the State statute, and also received the allowance made him by the Department, but always under protest, and always presenting each account made out at the contract price—75 cents a day per capita.

This state of things continued from April 30, 1876, until March 31, 1883—nearly seven years.

It should be stated at this point that in April, 1876, the Department made an order sending all the convicts thereafter convicted and sentenced by the United States courts in Arkansas and Louisiana for a longer term than one year to the penitentiary in West Virginia, and without any notice to Ward whatever, leaving with him only the sick, wounded, and short-term prisoners, whose services were of little value to him. It may be inquired why Judge Caldwell advised the disallowance of 75 cents per day. This is fully explained by his subsequent letter, as follows:

"LITTLE ROCK, ARK., May 11, 1886.

"MY DEAR SIR: In relation to Colonel Ward's claim for keeping United States prisoners I have this to say. When Colonel Ward first became the lessee of the penitentiary he had all the United States prisoners from this and the western district, aggregating a large number, and many of them long-term prisoners, sentenced to hard labor. In view of these facts, I thought then, and still think, that 50 cents per day for each prisoner, including all classes, was an adequate compensation; but afterwards, by an order of the Attorney-General, issued under authority of an act of Congress, all long-term prisoners were sentenced to imprisonment in the house of correction at Detroit, Mich. This left only the short-term prisoners, most of whom were not sentenced to labor at all, to be imprisoned in the Arkansas penitentiary. It is obvious that what would be a fair compensation per head for keeping all the United States prisoners, those sentenced to long terms and hard labor, as well as those sentenced to short terms and no labor, would not be an adequate compensation for keeping the last-named class alone.

"It is needless for me to say that I had no power to make a contract with Colonel Ward on this subject, or to revoke or modify any contract he had made with the Department, and I never assumed to do so. While the law then in force required me to examine the accounts paid by the marshal and approve or disapprove the same, my action went for nothing for any clerk in the Auditor's Office could then, as now, disregard my action. The approval or the disapproval of the judge settled nothing, and went for nothing, usually.

"Yours, truly, "HENRY C. CALDWELL,
"United States District Judge.

"Hon. J. H. ROGERS, M. C.,
"Washington City."

It is fair to presume that Judge Caldwell did not know what Ward's contract with the United States was, or, knowing it, thought in what he did to invite the attention of the Department to what he considered an exorbitant charge, that it might make a new contract with Ward. It resulted, however, as has been seen, in not only cutting down Ward's pay one-third of the contract price, but in the immediate withdrawal also of all the long-term prisoners. He makes no claim for damages for the breach of the contract, but only for the service actually performed by him.

The committee have examined all the correspondence that the Department of Justice could find on its files touching this claim, and have fairly stated the substance of the facts, and submit that claimant has established his claim to the extent of $19,615.

Your committee recommend that the words "twenty thousand three hundred and ninety dollars and eighty cents" in the bill be stricken out and the words "nineteen thousand six hundred and fifteen dollars" be inserted in lieu thereof, and when so amended that the bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE (during the reading of the report). I am willing that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, if the gentleman from Arkansas will state the substance of it.

Mr. SENEY. I think this matter is of enough importance to demand that the report be read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill was made to conform to the recommendation contained in the House bill, so that the appropriation is now for $19,615, instead of the larger sum. There was a discrepancy of some five or six hundred dollars between the report made from the Treasury Department and the itemized accounts as furnished by Colonel Ward. I declined to undertake to adjust that difference, and allowed the report to be made according to the account as sent in by the Treasury Department. It is proper I should state that the report of the committee is, with the exception of a single matter, based solely and absolutely, I believe, upon the official records of the Department of Justice, embracing the contracts and correspondence between Colonel Ward and the different Attorneys-General, together with Judge Caldwell's letter, and other matters of that kind. The report is a full and fair statement of the circumstances of the case exactly as they appear upon the public records of the Department of Justice.

Now, if there are any circumstances about which any gentleman desires to make inquiry, I shall be glad to reply.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it customary to authorize by special act of Congress the payment of expenses of this kind? Are they not generally paid as part of the court expenses?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. How are they usually paid?

Mr. ROGERS. These expenses are paid regularly by the Comptroller of the Treasury upon audited accounts of the marshal, which are submitted to the court for approval or disapproval. As Judge Caldwell says, the approval or disapproval of the court is the only safeguard of the Department; but this is subject, of course, to be overruled by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. KILGORE. Why were these accounts never paid in that way?

Mr. ROGERS. They were never made out in that way. Judge Caldwell stated to the Department of Justice that 50 cents per day for each prisoner was enough. Colonel Ward received this sum under protest.

Mr. KILGORE. Then he was paid 50 cents per day for each prisoner?

Mr. ROGERS. He was. The balance due is 25 cents per day for each of these prisoners, in conformity with the price named in the contract between Colonel Ward and the Government, this difference of 25 cents having been disallowed by action of the Department of Justice because of the recommendation of the judge of the court.

Mr. KILGORE. Does it appear in this investigation that the prisoners were employed at labor?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, no.

Mr. KILGORE. The claimant was the lessee of the penitentiary, I believe.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. And had the right to work the prisoners?

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all; only those who were sentenced, of course, to hard labor. A large class of those who were imprisoned there, as this report shows, or a considerable number of them, were disabled, by wounds or long confinement, from working. The short-time prisoners he had no right to work at all. He had to clothe, feed, take care of, and furnish medical attendance for all of them, but was not allowed to work any of them excepting those who were sentenced to hard labor. And, moreover, the hardship bore particularly hard upon Colonel Ward for this reason, that he could not break the contract with the Government because the State law compelled him to accept these prisoners.

Now, Judge Campbell, after the case had been before him, decided that he had no authority in the premises to revoke or modify the contract, but that it was a matter for the Department. The Department of Justice, however, as shown by the report, refused to do anything for the relief of Colonel Ward, and as a matter of fact they removed all the long-term prisoners, by an order of the Department, to Detroit, leaving him only the sick and wounded and those who were imprisoned for short terms; and for six years he was compelled to keep these in violation of the terms of the contract. He protested over and over again to the Department, but they refused to reconsider the order. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SENEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question in this connection.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. SENEY. Is there any existing law under which Colonel Ward's claim may be audited?

Mr. ROGERS. There is not so far as I am aware.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me ask a question.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What was to prevent this gentleman from going into the Court of Claims and seeking his remedy there?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know that there was any law at that time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think there was at this date, 1878.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not aware of that fact. It was long before I went to Congress. I did not know anything of it except what I found on the files of the Department, communications from ex-Senator Garland, ex-Senator Powell Clayton, and others, protesting against the injustice done to Colonel Ward. But I do not think he had a right to go into the Court of Claims at that time. If he had, I doubt if he knew the fact.

Mr. SENEY. Why would it not be a good move to send it there now?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will say to the gentleman, if my colleague will allow me——

Mr. ROGERS. Before I yield to my colleague, let me say there is not a particle of dispute between Colonel Ward and the Department on this bill.

There is no question as to the amount. The books correspond, except that there was a difference on the Treasury books in the amount of some five or six hundred dollars, which Colonel Ward abandoned, and he is perfectly willing to stand by the books of the Treasury. He makes no claim that is disputed in that respect.

Mr. SENEY. I understand from the reading of the report that there was a dispute between the accounting officers of the Government and the claimant as to the amount he was to receive under the contract.

Mr. ROGERS. No; that is a mistake.

Mr. SENEY. If I understand the reading of the report, he was allowed 50 cents per day.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; his contract says 75 cents.

Mr. SENEY. Yes; but he was allowed 50 cents.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true. The claim is for the amount withheld.

Mr. SENEY. And the contract called for seventy-five.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SENEY. But the accounting officers of the Treasury allowed him 50 cents only, and that he took, as the gentleman from Arkansas states, under protest?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SENEY. Now, it occurs to me that this is exactly the case to go to the Court of Claims, where that dispute between him and the accounting officers of the Treasury could be settled.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will say to my friend from Ohio that I think he is in error as to any dispute existing between Colonel Ward and the accounting officers of the Treasury. There is no dispute.

While this matter is outside of my immediate district, yet the claimant is an old acquaintance of mine, and I understand very well about his business and I have looked carefully into this claim. There is no dispute about the amount. There is no dispute as to the facts set forth in the contract and no dispute as to the amount in this report and bill that Colonel Ward claims from the Department at all, none whatever.

The dispute was in reference to the first recommendation of Judge Caldwell that 50 cents was adequate for the prisoners as an entirety. Now, when Judge Caldwell found that the Government had taken all the prisoners that labored away from Colonel Ward, he then wrote the second letter set forth in the report, stating that the contract price was not excessive for the character of the prisoners left with the licensees. Hence there is no dispute anywhere in the bill.

He is now claiming 25 cents per day under the letter of the contract without regard to whether they had taken the long-term prisoners away from him or not, and leaving him only those unfit for labor; and the court, on a review of the question, revoked the previous recommendation and said the contract price should be allowed.

Mr. SENEY. A word in response to the gentleman from Arkansas. It is apparent that there is some reason why the Department did not allow Mr. Ward the entire claim he made. It is conceded here that he wanted 75 cents. It is claimed, I believe, that he was entitled to that under the contract; but the accounting officers of the Treasury thought otherwise.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No; I beg pardon; they did not think otherwise; not as to the contract. That question was not raised by the Department.

Mr. SENEY. The point I wish to make is simply this: There was some reason, whatever that reason may have been, why these accounting officers of the Government did not allow Mr. Ward his pay. I think for that reason—call it a legal dispute or call it what you please—we ought to send this man to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. My friend will observe one consideration. The reason in the case is very plain. It is stated by the circuit judge. He states that he thought Ward was to continue to receive the sound as well as the unsound prisoners. That was the reason and that was the basis of the judge's recommendation. The judge distinctly states that reason was done away with. I think the gentleman is right as to there having been a reason, but the reason is perfectly clear. The judge leaves it no shadow of doubt. He withdraws entirely his former statement.

Mr. SENEY. There was a reason, but there is no reason now.

Mr. ROGERS. Allow me to make a statement to my friend from Ohio. When I examined this claim the first thing I did was to send a communication in writing to the Department of Justice, asking for every paper relating to the transaction. My friend will accept my statement when I say I have carefully read every paper in connection with the case; every letter and every paper; and they were before the committee. The reason, and the only reason that can be found upon the records of either Department, is this letter of Judge Caldwell which is set out in the report. That is explained away by his subsequent letter, showing the misapprehension upon his part as to the relations which obtained between Ward and the Department.

Mr. SENEY. What is the difficulty in the way of sending the case to the Court of Claims?

Mr. ROGERS. This last letter of Judge Caldwell explaining the case was addressed to me after I came to Congress; ten years after the transaction took place.

Mr. LANHAM. Judge Caldwell does not pretend to deny that the Government contracted to pay 75 cents, and only paid 50 cents.

Mr. ROGERS. In my judgment every material fact is contained in the report; and all the evidence was laid before the committee and carefully considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], as he has carefully examined these papers, how many years elapsed after the letter of Judge Caldwell was written before this contract was finally concluded?

Mr. ROGERS. The contract was finally signed in November, 1874, and the order of the Department taking the long-term prisoners away was made April 30, 1876, and continued until March, 1883, nearly seven years.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other question. I hope as my friend has examined these papers he will give the form of some one of those receipts made annually during that period of seven years.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this report was made early in the present session. It is the sixty-sixth bill on the record. The report was made in January last. I have not read one of the accounts since, and do not remember the form; but I do know that every one of them was made under protest. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Senate bill——

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is objection until I know more about this case, although I do not wish to take the time of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am anxious to see the form of one of those receipts. I have had enough experience in the Claims Committee to know that the cases are necessarily largely ex parte.

Mr. LANHAM. I think that was not the case here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is important to know what construction this claimant himself put upon the contract after the time the letter of Judge Caldwell was written.

It is said that the money was received under protest during those seven years. I should be glad to see the receipt. It must be an oversight on the part of the committee, because the form of the receipt of course enters very largely into this transaction.

I wish to add a single word to what I said on that point. The duties of Judge Caldwell were clear enough. All gentlemen understand exactly his relations to this contract. All gentlemen understand distinctly to what he had to certify to enable the settlement of accounts from his court. Judge Caldwell finding one fact omitted in that contract—any reference whatever to the right of the lessee to employ the labor of those who were able to work—states in his letter that as to those who were not able to labor 75 cents was a reasonable price to have been paid by the Government, but as to those who were employed by the lessee, 50 cents was reasonable compensation.

That was the statement of Judge Caldwell, if I understood the reading correctly. From that I infer that the persons who were not able to labor, if they were paid for on the basis of that letter, were paid for at the rate of 75 cents per man.

Mr. ROGERS. But they were not. The rate was cut down as to all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that the letter of Judge Caldwell be read again.

Mr. ROGERS. The first letter or the second letter?

Mr. HOLMAN. The first letter. The second letter simply says what every judge would say in such a case—that it was not his contract; that he was simply bound by law to certify the accounts of the expenses paid by the marshal within his district, or that came within it by reason of the location of the penitentiary.

The extract from the first letter of Judge Caldwell, which is printed in the foregoing report of the Committee on Claims, was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the way I stated it. Now, the fact does not appear here whether or no the accounts were settled upon the basis there stated, but it is fair to presume that they were, and, if so, those persons who were able to labor were employed in labor——

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. I state emphatically that they were not settled on that basis, and the Treasury Department does not pretend that they were.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. ROGERS. Judge Caldwell's letter states all that I know about the reason. They were all paid for at 50 cents a day, those not sentenced to hard labor as well as the others, in violation of the specific terms of the contract.

Mr. LANHAM. In the original contract entered into between the lessees of the penitentiary and the Attorney-General of the United States there was nothing said as to long-term or short-term prisoners, but it was provided that they should take all prisoners——

Mr. HOLMAN (interrupting). I have already said that all of that was omitted. That was the basis on which the judge made his statement, in conflict with the terms of the contract itself, that 50 cents per head was a reasonable payment for those who could labor, upon the idea that in addition to the compensation paid by the Government the lessee was obtaining the benefit of the labor of those men, which benefit ought to inure not to the advantage of the lessee, but to the advantage of the United States.

Now, does my friend think it a proper thing, after a judge has passed upon the subject with the whole matter under his eye, charged with this duty, familiar with the contract, and bound to know the terms of the contract he was writing about—does my friend think it is a proper thing to ask this House to revise the judge's action?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will permit me, was not the contract executed subject to the laws of the land, and did not those laws require the judge to approve the accounts?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, of course.

Mr. LANHAM. Let me read what the judge says about that:

It is needless for me to say that I have no power to make a contract with Colonel Ward on this subject, or to revoke or modify any contract he had made with the Department, and I never assumed to do so.

Now, the contract makes this stipulation:

The said parties of the first part shall and will safely keep, subsist, and clothe and furnish the necessary medical attendance and medicine for all such persons as may be sent to the said penitentiary of the State of Arkansas for the district of Louisiana, and the said party of the second part doth hereby covenant and agree on her part that she will well and truly pay to the said parties of the second part the sum of 75 cents per day for each and every person so safely kept, subsisted, etc.

Mr. HOLMAN. The terms of the contract have been repeated over and over again, and I am obliged to my friend for repeating them now; but I do not think that the individual members of this House should be placed in the position that this places them in. I do not believe, for instance, that my friend in front of me [Mr. GLASS] should be called upon by his own silence—that silence being affirmative in this case—to overrule the decision of the judge who decided this matter with all the facts before him. It is an unpleasant position in which to place any member on this floor. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Is there any allegation of fraud anywhere in reference to this contract?

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Well, if the situation were reversed, if Mr. Ward had failed to keep his contract, and the matter were brought before the judge presiding in his court, would he not have compelled Mr. Ward to pay the utmost farthing?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from New York differs with Judge Caldwell.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then, if he does not differ with him——

Mr. ROGERS (interposing). Oh, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is a fair argument. I do not think the gentleman from Indiana ought to put the case in that way. It is not a judicial question. It was not a question that the judge had entered into except upon the face of the papers. He saw that 75 cents was charged for these prisoners, and he sat down, and, under the authority given him to approve or disapprove these accounts, simply cut down the accounts arbitrarily without a hearing. That is all there was about it. Then the accounts were sent here to the Department, and upon that simple statement the Department of Justice went beyond what the judge had done and deprived Mr. Ward not only of the short-term prisoners and those who were not required to labor at all, but also of the long-term prisoners whom he had a right to work under their sentences.

Now, there can not be any doubt at all that, when this contract was entered into, everybody knew the circumstances in regard to these prisoners being sentenced to labor. There is another fact which I can state from information furnished me by the Department of Justice, that from the very beginning, as shown in this correspondence, the Department of Justice, as well as the Senators then here from that State, had knowledge of Colonel Ward's protest against the action of the Department from time to time during this entire transaction. The correspondence is on file and was furnished to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has my friend any statement from the Department of Justice or elsewhere as to the number of prisoners imprisoned at this prison during the term of this contract who were able to work and did work, and the number who did not work?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; and that is not material, because all the long-term prisoners were sent away; and as to the others the allowance to Colonel Ward was cut down to 50 cents a day. The Government never paid more than 50 cents, that being all that Judge Caldwell thought ought to be paid.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. We can cite conclusive evidence on that point. These transactions relate to what transpired after the first letter of Judge Caldwell; and my colleague [Mr. ROGERS] can cite the orders of the Department immediately after this first letter, taking away all these profitable prisoners.

Mr. ROGERS. These documents are in the record.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It also appears that if the Government had left the profitable prisoners there Colonel Ward would have been perfectly satisfied to have taken 50 cents a day for each prisoner as compensation for the entire time, but immediately after this first letter the Government, as shown by the orders which are in evidence, took away the profitable prisoners. Judge Caldwell's second letter states that after this action of the Government taking away all the profitable prisoners, the recommendation that he made did not apply.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just one word on the general principle which seems to cover this case. In my view it is against the dignity of the United States to keep a citizen year after year out of his money due upon a contract, when there is no allegation of fraud, simply because the Government has the physical power thus to hang up a just claim through the action of an accounting officer. If the circumstances were reversed, the same Department of Justice would sell the man's property and compel him to make payment. Let this country do justice to the citizen whose case is submitted to its sovereign will, just as it exacts justice from him when it has the sovereign power to do so. This is a principle which should govern all cases of this kind in the absence of any fraud. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending claim be now closed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not consent to that at this moment, though I would be glad to accommodate my friend from Texas. In reference to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHITE], I will say we have heard that same speech in other cases.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. It is a good one.

Mr. HOLMAN. When my friend from New York shall have served here half the length of time which I have served upon the Committee on Claims of this House, he will modify very much his views in regard to matters of this kind.

Now, let me say that this case was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims from the beginning. Of course all gentlemen know that.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been within the jurisdiction of the court ever since its organization in 1863.

Mr. SENEY. Do you mean under the general law?

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean under the general law. When the court was first organized, in 1853 or 1854, no final judgment could be rendered; but when the court was given jurisdiction of claims arising under contract, parties in cases of this kind were entitled to their day in court under the law. But there are two reasons, I imagine, why this case was not presented to the court. One was that these receipts were signed from time to time during this period of seven years, and were receipts in full.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Oh, no.

Mr. ROGERS. That is not the fact. I have so stated to my friend over and over again.

Mr. HOLMAN. How does it happen that all the facts do not appear on the face of these papers?

Mr. ROGERS. Why, Mr. Speaker, if I had published all this correspondence it would have made a book. I have set out every substantial fact; but if all the correspondence, embracing all the long letters which passed between the Department and Colonel Ward, had been printed here the report would have been so long that it would have taken all night to read it. I have read every line of the correspondence; and I state here now that the letters of Colonel Ward were the strongest possible appeals that the Government should observe its contract and keep faith with its citizens. But he got no relief. I do not think my friend from Indiana ought to undertake to question statements which I make over and over again as a matter of fact, and the evidence of which has been before the Committee on Claims in writing, copies of all the documents having been sent to the committee by the Department of Justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the papers in this case are at the desk or on file. As I was remarking, receipts were no doubt given during the seven years, and these accounts were examined from year to year during that time. I assume that the judge who passed upon these accounts was more familiar with the facts than I am. I should have been very glad to have seen those receipts. If receipts were not given, or if payment was received under protest, which appeared on the face of the papers, the Court of Claims was open to this claimant all the time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 39, noes 6.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not intend to raise the point of no quorum inasmuch as the House seems to be so unanimous.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The House bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

JOHN J. BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 21) for the relief of John J. Brown.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state under the order of the House bills only are to be considered which are not objected to. The Clerk will read the report, subject to objection.

Mr. ENLOE. If we read every report through it will take up much more time than by making a statement of the facts.

Mr. KILGORE. To save all further expenditure of time unnecessarily I will object, Mr. Chairman, to taking up this case.

JOHN S. BRAXTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 613) for the relief John S. Braxton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the personal representatives of John S. Braxton, late collector of customs at Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,332.40, wrongfully taken by subordinates in his office, and the larger part of the same misapplied in payment of light-house keepers, whose salaries should have been paid by his predecessor, and for which the United States were liable, the said Braxton not having been at fault in the matter.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to cause suit to be instituted against the sureties of Luther Lee, jr., the predecessor of said John S. Braxton, upon his official bond as disbursing agent of the United States or otherwise, if, in his opinion, such suit would be availing to recover any moneys taken from his successor and wrongfully misapplied in payment of his delinquencies or defalcations.

Mr. BOWDEN. I call up that case and ask for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Read the report of the committee.

Mr. LANHAM. This report is a long one, much of it being in small type, and if any gentleman contemplates objecting to the bill it had better be done at once.

Mr. MCMILLIN. To avoid the necessity of objection, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. BOWDEN. I can state the facts in the case in a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed, subject to the right to object.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I dislike to seem to be captious, but here is a claim where it is proposed to pay back to an officer money either stolen or squandered by his subordinates. I think the facts should be clearly shown to authorize such repayment. For the purpose of getting at the facts I ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

Mr. BOWDEN. Of course, if the reading of the report is insisted upon, it is not necessary I should make any statement.

The fact is, the bill has already passed the House twice and the Senate once, but it never became the law. When Mr. Braxton was appointed collector of customs at Norfolk, Va., in 1877——

A MEMBER. Has the reading of the report been dispensed with?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

A MEMBER. Then I will insist upon it.

Mr. BOWDEN. If the report of the committee is to be read I will not insist on making any further statement.

The report (by Mr. BOWDEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of John S. Braxton, late collector of customs at Norfolk, Va., for the reimbursement of the sum of $1,332.40, paid by him to cover alleged defalcation by subordinate officials in his office, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That having inquired into the facts, and finding that the matter had been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-fifth Congress, adopt that report with slight modifications, as follows:

That it appears from the petition of said collector, which is under oath, and from other affidavits and papers presented to the committee, that said John S. Braxton was appointed collector of customs at Norfolk, Va., in February, 1877; that he found in said office when he took possession of the same and entered upon his duties Charles E. Gettslich, deputy collector and clerk, and Henry Miller, warehouse and entry clerk; that these were responsible positions, by virtue of which these officers had virtual custody of the funds appertaining to said office, receiving the cash, depositing it, etc.

It further appears that the reputation of said Gettslich and Miller for honesty, integrity, and efficiency as officers was high in the community as well as at the Department; that said Gettslich had been a customs officer for twenty-two years and said Miller had been for eight years, and both were represented as being very familiar with their duties; and said collector states under oath that he was advised that the retention of these two officers, thus experienced, was a necessity; and, moreover, that the avowed policy of the Government was against the removal of officers unless charges were preferred and substantiated against them; and that for these reasons, although he was desirous of substituting other persons better known to him in their places, yet he was constrained to keep said Gettslich and Miller in office.

It further appears that after said John S. Braxton took possession of his said office and entered upon his duties as collector, the said Gettslich and Miller were guilty of taking from the public funds collected in said collector's office, and for which said John S. Braxton was responsible, the sum of $1,553.76, $778.50 of which was wrongfully and fraudulently applied by them in the payment of the salaries of certain light-house keepers, which accrued during the incumbency in office of Luther Lee, jr., the predecessor of said John S. Braxton in said collector's office; and the balance was applied to their own use.

As soon as the said John S. Braxton discovered the wrongful taking and embezzlement of this money, he deducted from the $1,553.76 taken the sum of $221.36, which was due to the said Gettslich and Miller on their salaries, and at once placed the sum of $1,332.40, the remainder of the sum embezzled and wrongfully taken by them, in bank, to the credit of the United States, out of his own private funds. The evidence clearly shows that of the amount wrongfully taken by the said Gettslich and Miller from the funds collected by the said John S. Braxton, and for which he was responsible, $778.50 was taken and wrongfully and fraudulently applied in payment of the salaries of light-house keepers, which had accrued during the incumbency of the said Luther Lee, jr., and for the payment of which funds had been previously furnished by the United States to him, the said Luther Lee, jr., but which had not been applied by him for that purpose.

Instead of using the money furnished for the payment of these salaries, overdrawn checks were issued by the said Gettslich, as special deputy, and after the said John S. Braxton became the collector, funds collected under him, and for which he was responsible, were taken by said Gettslich and Miller, and fraudulently applied in payment of said overdrawn checks, and of the salaries of said light-house keepers, as before stated. This amount, therefore, of $778.50, the committee are of the opinion was wrongfully and fraudulently applied in payment of salaries for which the United States Government was responsible, and that the same should be refunded to the said Braxton, and the amount recovered from the sureties of the said Lee on his official bond.

As to the balance of the said sum of $1,553.76 taken by said Gettslich and Miller, amounting to the sum of $553.90, it is claimed by the said John S. Braxton that he is not liable for the wrongful acts of the said Gettslich and Miller, his subordinates; and for the reason that he does not appoint them, but that he only nominates and the Secretary of the Treasury appoints his deputies and other subordinates and removes them at pleasure. Said Braxton further claims that even if liable in ordinary cases for the acts of his subordinates, he should not be in this case, for the reason, as he swears, that he wanted to substitute other officers who were better known to him in place of said Gettslich and Miller; but because of their high standing in the Department, their long experience in the customs service, and the civil service rules as to the changes of officers, he was constrained to keep them in office against his own judgment and wishes.

It appears that through the diligence and earnest efforts of Braxton in hunting up the wrongs and frauds committed in said collector's office under the administration of it by the said Luther Lee, jr., his predecessor, the Government has recovered judgment against Lee's sureties for $13,948.35, which, but for his efforts, would have been a loss to the Government. And your committee, relying upon the truth of these statements, and believing that said John S. Braxton has not been guilty of any want of care and prudence, of any negligence or wrong on his part, but, on the contrary, has shown himself to be an honest, faithful, and diligent officer, after a careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances, and without determining the question whether collectors of customs are legally liable for the wrongful acts of their subordinates when not at fault themselves or not, are of the opinion that it is but an act of justice to Mr. Braxton that he should be relieved from loss in this matter, and that the said sum of $1,332.40, which was wrongfully taken by the said Miller and Gettslich, and which, to save his own good name from suspicion, he at once, on discovery of the fraud and the amount taken, deposited in bank to the credit of the Government, should be refunded to him; and for that purpose the committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill now before the committee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but it seems to me there is no just ground stated to relieve this officer from the loss incurred by the acts of his subordinates. It seems this officer——

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand the Chair to say it is too late for me to object to the consideration of the bill? I understood the reading of the report was called for, and that it was read subject to objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The report was read; after which the Chair asked for objection, and there was no objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] rose to make objection, or I should have done so.

Mr. LANHAM. The Chair asked for objection and there was none.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This officer does not claim he made any effort to discharge these subordinates. I noticed that part of the report particularly where it is worded with painstaking care. It does not appear there was any effort on the part of this officer to get rid of these subordinates. It was suggested he was constrained to keep them by reason of the fact of their long experience, and it being stated they were essential to the performance of the duties of the office. In my judgment we should hold these officers to strict accountability, and to the exercise of due diligence and proper control over their subordinates. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am constrained to oppose the bill.

Mr. BOWDEN. I will state for the information of the gentleman that in drawing the report——

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, it is also stated by a gentleman near me, as a matter bearing upon this question, that there is nothing from the Treasury Department showing that it assumed the responsibility for the retention of these men or recommended the appointment.

Mr. BOWDEN. I was just going to say, Mr. Chairman, that in drawing the report I used a former report, which, inadvertently I presume, omitted the point to which attention has been called here, and it escaped my observation at the time.

So far as the papers are concerned it appears that Colonel Braxton did ask the removal of these subordinates, and was refused at the Department. It seems that the facts came out in a month or so after his appointment while organizing his office, and he suggested the appointment of other people and the displacement of these; and his efforts succeeded in unearthing these frauds, and also in securing the conviction of these parties, one of whom was sent to jail and the other to the penitentiary for a term. Through his efforts also the Government recovered some $13,000 against the sureties of his predecessor, which was collected.

Mr. COBB. To whom did he make the suggestion of the removal?

Mr. BOWDEN. To the Secretary of the Treasury. That comes out quite plainly in the testimony.

Mr. COBB. The report does not show it.

Mr. BOWDEN. No; I have just stated that I adopted a report made in a former Congress, and through inadvertence that was left out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 27, noes 9.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Mr. LANHAM. There is evidently no quorum in the House; and I appeal to my colleague not to insist upon the point.

Mr. KILGORE. Why?

Mr. LANHAM. We are very axious to do some business to-night. Our Committee on Claims have been quite active and industrious during this whole session of Congress, and this is the very first opportunity for the consideration of any of the bills reported to this Congress except such as have been reported and acted upon by unanimous consent. The great majority of those present have voted in favor of laying this bill aside, and I hope my colleague will not insist upon his objection, but satisfy himself with voting against the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. I suppose this is all out of order.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I wish to add, further, that we have accommodated every member on the floor of the House who appeared before us with meritorious measures. The committee treated them fairly and decently, and we have the right to expect the same treatment.

Mr. KILGORE. We are all out of order, but I wish to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is only proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to say only this, that I have strong convictions in this case that the Government is not liable for the amount claimed, and, if that is my conviction, if every man in this House should vote for it I could not satisfy my conviction by contenting myself with that fact and allowing the matter to pass. If every man voted for it it would be my duty to sustain what I believe to be right in opposing it. That is all I claim. By passing this bill we simply transfer the responsibility on President Cleveland to veto it; and I am not willing to become a party to such a proceeding as that.

Mr. POST. Would not a single objection have caused this bill to be passed over?

The CHAIRMAN. It would. The Chair thought the gentleman from Tennessee had risen for that purpose, as he states.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it is but due to the Chair to state this: I recognize the fact that the Chair called for objections, and that the time for objection had, in my opinion, been passed when I rose and addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated.

The point of no quorum being made——

Mr. BUCHANAN. A single word. I had just as strong conscientious convictions against the bill of the gentleman from Arkansas; but I did not raise the point of order of no quorum. I shall, however, if this course is to be pursued when this subject comes before the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I will join you in that.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the bill.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. I was just about to rise to make that request.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Allow me to say before that request is submitted in regard to this bill, and with reference to other bills upon the Calendar, in view of what the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from New Jersey have said, that whenever a gentleman opposed a bill by voting against it I think his conscience ought to be satisfied that he has done his duty.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mine was satisfied until it was tendered by the action of the gentleman from Texas. I do not want any one-sided business in the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I will stand by you in that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not mean to criticise either gentleman—either the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I only wanted to insist, in view of the possible action upon other bills on the Calendar, that I hope the gentlemen will satisfy their conscience by voting against the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to withdrawing the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not want to object. I simply want to ask, if we can not all agree, that our consciences can be satisfied by voting against any bill that we do not approve without calling for a quorum.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought so.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOWDEN] that he be permitted to withdraw this bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again call attention to the fact that we are proceeding under an order which forbids the consideration of any bill when objection is made to it.

Mr. BYNUM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYNUM. The wording of the rule under which we are acting does not say that bills shall be considered to the consideration of which there is no objection; it says "bills to which there is no objection." Now, I submit that where there is serious opposition to a bill there is "objection" to it, and according to the spirit of the rule, at least, that objection ought to carry the bill over.

Mr. LANHAM. That is not the construction that was intended to be given to the order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of opinion that there can not be objection and consideration at the same time. There must be a time when the bill is presented for consideration, and when that stage is reached the time for objection is past; so, after the reading of a bill the Chair asks for objections, and then, if the reading of the report is asked for, it is read subject to objection.

Mr. BYNUM. The Chair calls for objection to the consideration of the bill, but the order does not say bills the consideration of which shall be objected to; it says bills to which there is no objection, and whenever any objection is made by a member on the floor to a bill, I submit that it is the duty of the Chair to rule that that bill does not come within the special order for this evening session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the order under which this session is held.

The Clerk again read the order as follows:

On motion of Mr. LANHAM,

Ordered, That a recess be taken to-morrow [Saturday] evening at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock p. m.; the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims to which there shall be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will see that the order speaks of the "consideration of bills to which there shall be no objection." The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN J. COUGHLIN.

The next business upon the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SHAW) was the bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay John J. Coughlin the sum of $631.13, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum being difference of pay from laborer, at $1.25 per day, to skilled laborer, at $4 per day, for two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half days, in arranging, cataloguing and classifying bound volumes of newspapers in the Library of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. COBB. If we do not see proper to object to the consideration of the bill, is it therefore to be inferred that we are committed to its passage?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. COBB. Why not? Well——

The CHAIRMAN. If the consideration of the bill is not objected to, the measure is then before the committee, and the after conduct of each member with reference to it must be left to his own judgment, subject to the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the old rule of the House, which was in force, I think, for half a century (I believe they have a similar rule now in the Senate), two days of every other week, Fridays and Saturdays, for instance, were set apart as objection days, the other Fridays and Saturdays being days in which measures came up in the regular order.

That was the old rule, and had been the rule uninterruptedly for a great many years prior to the adoption of the present rules a few years ago. When a case was reported——

Mr. LANHAM (interposing). Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interrupt my friend, but I must insist on the regular order. It is very interesting to hear these historical statements, but our time is too limited.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would not have occupied near so much time as the gentleman himself has occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the action of every member with reference to any bill is a matter for his own conscience, but the time to object is when the Chair asks whether there is objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was all that I was going to state, that the objection must be made at once, otherwise no vote could be taken under such a rule as this. The matter is to be acted upon nem. con., unless objection is promptly made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The report (by Mr. SHAW) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin, report as follows:

That said John J. Coughlin was employed by the Architect of the Capitol, from March 6, 1883, to November 30, 1883, as a laborer at $1.25 per day; that he was assigned to duty under the Librarian of Congress during this period of two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half days, and engaged in a work requiring skilled and intelligent labor, in the cataloguing and arranging of newspapers published in the several States and Territories of the United States, in England, France, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Russia, Cuba, India, Egypt, China, Mexico, and the Central and South American states, constituting a collection of rare historical value; that his pay was inadequate for the service rendered, and that he is entitled to a more equitable and just compensation.

During a portion of the time he was employed J. B. Fay was associated with him in the work, receiving pay as a laborer. That Congress, recognizing the value of his (Fay's) services, appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation bill approved July 7, 1884, the sum of $313.44, making the compensation of said Fay during the time he was employed $4 per day. (See Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 226.)

Your committee believe that, in justice and right, said John J. Coughlin should be paid an equal sum with that received by J. B. Fay—at the rate of $4 per day—especially in view of the statement by the Librarian of Congress that said Coughlin rendered valuable service and is justly entitled to more compensation than $1.25 per day, the pay of a laborer.

Your committee find that the difference of pay between $1.25 and $4 per day for 229½ days amounts to the sum of $631.13, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, which provides for the payment of the same.

This bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims for the Forty-ninth Congress, and passed the House, but failed to secure the approval of the Senate, as it was never reported to that body by the committee to which it was referred.

The committee herewith append the statement of Hon. A. R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, as part of this report:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of John J. Coughlin respectfully represents that he was placed upon the rolls of Edward Clark, esq., Architect of the Capitol, on the 7th day of March, 1883, and assigned by him to duty under A. R. Spofford, esq., Librarian of Congress.

That said duty consisted in arranging, classifying, cataloguing, and placing in the rooms prepared for them, under the rotunda, all the bound volumes of newspapers which had accumulated in the State Department and been recently turned over to said Librarian, comprising many newspapers commencing in the last century, and belonging to the several States and Territories of the United States, to England, France, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Russia, Cuba, India, Egypt, China, and the Central and South American States and Mexico, a collection of rare historical value.

That said newspapers, files, books, and pamphlets would have been materially damaged if allowed to long remain in the immense heaps in which they were piled upon the floors of the rooms occupied by them, and an early and systematic disposition of the same was absolutely necessary.

That your petitioner was engaged in said work continuously from the 7th day of March, 1883, up to and including the 30th day of November, 1883, and received for his services during said period the sum of $285.87, laborer's wages, Mr. Clark having no authority to pay more for temporary work, and the Librarian, Mr. Spofford, having no appropriation whatever out of which to pay for the work and labor performed, although so urgently necessary.

Your petitioner therefore respectfully prays your honorable body to allow him the sum per diem ($4) compensation which obtains in said Library for work of a similar nature, or which may be considered as fair and proper in the premises, deducting therefrom the nominal sum already paid, namely, $286.87, for two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half days.

And, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

JOHN J. COUGHLIN, Petitioner.

John J. Coughlin in account with A. R. Spofford, esq., Librarian of Congress.

By work performed, arranging, classifying, and cataloguing the bound volumes of newspapers in Congressional Library, from March 6, 1883, to November 30, 1883:

229½ days, at $4 per day	$918.00
To cash received, at $1.25 per day	286.87
Balance due your petitioner	631.13

JOHN J. COUGHLIN.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, Washington, April 2, 1886.

This will certify that the services of Mr. John J. Coughlin were employed for several weeks in the fiscal year 1883-'84 in arranging several thousand volumes of newspapers, which it became necessary to remove and arrange in the Library of Congress, in an emergency requiring prompt transfer. The work involved skilled and intelligent labor, but Mr. Coughlin received only day laborer's wages, and was justly entitled to more.

Very respectfully,

A. R. SPOFFORD,
Librarian of Congress.

ARCHITECT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1888.

I hereby certify that John J. Coughlin was employed as laborer on the annual repairs United States Capitol from March 7, 1883, to November 30, 1883, two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half days, at $1.25 per day, $286.87.

WILLIAM McPYNCHEON,
Clerk, Architect's Office, United States Capitol.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not like to object, but this looks to me like a claim that ought not to be paid. It is simply a case like many others where a man goes into the service of the Government at a certain definite rate of compensation, is put upon the roll at that rate, accepts the employment and the pay, and then later comes in with a claim for extra compensation. The man, as in this case, goes upon the roll as a laborer, but gets an easier job in a certain sense, is on the roll for two hundred days, draws his pay for that time as a laborer under the contract, and then at a future time, because somebody else is successful in getting a bill through Congress giving him additional pay, comes and asks for $2.75 extra for each day he was on the roll. It seems to me that this is not the sort of claim that ought to be allowed. It is not a debt in any sense; it is a mere gratuity, and a gratuity upon false pretenses.

Mr. SHAW. The duty performed by this gentleman, as certified to by the Librarian of Congress, required a degree of intelligence such as is not often found among laborers. Mr. Coughlin, it is true, was employed as a "laborer" and put on the laborer's roll, but when he was so employed it was not contemplated that he should perform this special duty, and the evidence is that he did perform it intelligently and satisfactorily in connection with Mr. Fay. Mr. Coughlin received only laborer's pay, but Mr. Fay succeeded in getting $4 a day for the same service, though both men were performing like duty and were on the same roll. The Librarian of Congress certifies that the work was intelligently and well done, and that Mr. Coughlin was entitled to more pay for it than he received. If the gentleman [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky] maintains, as I am sure he does not, that it is easier to work with the head than with the hand, then in a certain sense it is true that Mr. Coughlin had easier work than he would have had as a laborer, but in another sense it was more difficult work, and such work as an ordinary laborer could not have performed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no doubt that every statement of the gentleman from Maryland is accurate; but what he says only enforces the objection I have to claims of this kind. Each one of us knows that it is very common in all the Departments in Washington for persons to be put on the laborers' roll when the work to be done by such persons is not properly laborers' work. This is a mode by which public employment is given to persons to do other work than that of laborers. Consequently at every session of Congress for many years back (because these claims come up in accordance with some settled precedent in former Congresses) these persons, who were anxious to get employment and who contracted with the Government to do particular work to which they were assigned, and who received for it the pay which was promised to them, come in and plead that they are entitled to higher compensation because the service rendered by them was of a higher character. I say this is a bad precedent; and so far as it has become a precedent, it is one which is "more honored in the breach than in the observance."

While this is a small claim, it is a very good claim upon which to turn the lane. The saying has been that "it is a long lane which has no turning." Almost all these claims have heretofore been passed by Congress; but now it seems to me this is a very good claim on which to make the turn. The facts are simply that this man was put on the laborers' roll and executed work to which he was assigned.

Mr. SHAW. But he was employed in the office of the Architect, and he performed this service for the Librarian of Congress—a service which by virtue of his employment he was under no obligation to perform. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was decided in the affirmative—ayes 29, noes 17.

SUFFERERS BY WRECK OF STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

The next business on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. MCKINNEY) was the bill (H. R. 438) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa.

Mr. McKINNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill on this subject, which is similar, be considered in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. To facilitate business, I will state that the Senate bill as well as the House bill was considered carefully in the Committee on Claims, and it was decided to substitute the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole will consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

There was no objection.

Senate bill 869, for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to reimburse the survivors of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, wrecked at Vineyard Sound on the night of the 21st of August, 1884, for the losses incurred by them, respectively, in said wreck, there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, namely: To John F. Merry, lieutenant-commander; William H. Everett, lieutenant; Frank M.

Beatty, lieutenant, junior grade; Nathan P. Towne, passed assistant engineer; W. B. Whittlesey, ensign; O. C. Tiffany, passed assistant paymaster, each $1,000. To Hugh Kuhl, mate; James W. Baxter, mate; L. B. Gallagher, mate; Leonard Hanscom, carpenter; James Bishop, jr., pay-clerk; Thomas B. Kramer, apothecary, each $700. To Lieut. W. H. Jaques, for loss of portion of naval uniform, including epaulettes, sword, sword-belt, sword-knot, etc., $115.

To all the survivors of the crew, namely: Joseph Arnold, first-class fireman; William A. Brooks, landsman; J. G. Baker, blacksmith; Charles E. Brown, steward to commander-in-chief; John W. Sewell, quartermaster; Frank Small, seaman; Henry K. Steever, first-class machinist; Charles F. Scott, coxswain to commander-in-chief; Patrick Sweeney, captain of forecastle; Edward Small, landsman; J. D. Skidmore, landsman; Christian A. Simon, landsman; Frank Sullivan, landsman; Peter Thompson, cox-swain; George Tinker, steerage cook; John Thompson, seaman; Herbert S. Trueman, captain of after-guard: Clarence D. Tippitt, second-class fireman; Daniel Tinsley, landsman; Jan C. Tinnman, ordinary seaman; James Taylor, seaman; William J. Turner, coal-heaver; Samuel W. Wells, engineer's yeoman; Isaac Williams, coal-heaver; Murray Williams, coal-heaver; Fred. Williams, landsman; Andrew White, wardroom cook; Charles Williams, ordinary seaman; Oscar Westerholm, seaman; Henry H. Walker, first-class machinist, each $100.

SEC. 2. That the widow, child, or children, or in case there be not such, then the parent or parents, and if there be no parents, the brothers and sisters of those in the service who were lost in the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, namely, Clarence E. Black, passed assistant surgeon; William O'Donnell, seaman; George A. Foster, landsman, shall be entitled to and shall receive, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: The relatives in the order named, of the persons connected with the United States steamer Tallapoosa hereinbefore referred to, a sum equal to twelve month's sea-pay of each person lost: Provided, That the legal representatives of the above deceased persons who were in the service of the Government shall also be paid from the Treasury of the United States any arrears of pay due said deceased at the time of their death: And provided further, That there shall be deducted from the sums allowed each of the parties named in this act whatever amounts may have been paid them under the provisions of existing law.

SEC. 3. That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle, upon principles of justice and equity, the accounts of the officers and crew on board the said vessel when wrecked, and to assume the last quarterly return of the paymaster of said vessel as the basis of computation of the subsequent credits to those on board to the date of such loss, if there be no evidence to the contrary.

Passed the Senate March 29, 1888.

Attest: ANSON G. McCOOK, Secretary.
By CHAS. W. JOHNSON, Chief Clerk.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to hear the report read, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill No. 438, recommend that the bill be amended by adding after the proviso, in section 2, the words, "And provided further, That there shall be deducted from the sums allowed each of the parties named in the bill whatever amounts may have been paid them under the provisions of existing law."

And that when so amended the bill pass.

Your committee are satisfied from inquiry that the amounts recommended to be paid are only a fair and reasonable compensation for the losses sustained. That the sinking of the ship of war Tallapoosa was without fault of the claimants named in the bill, and so determined by a court of inquiry.

In further support of the recommendations of the committee, we add hereto a favorable report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs of the last Congress, as follows:

"This bill provides an appropriation simply sufficient to enable the officers to refurnish themselves with an outfit. We are assured that it will be just about sufficient for that purpose. The first section also provides for the payment of $100 to each of the surviving seamen, which we think will about cover the actual loss that each one of them sustained. Both officers and men were rescued destitute of everything, and all they ask is simply to be refurnished with an outfit suitable to the service to which they belong.

"For this bill there are many precedents. Under similar circumstances, in 1848, a bill was passed for the relief of the relatives of those who were lost on the brig Somers, the precise language of which has been copied in the second section of this bill. That precedent was followed in 1853 in the case of the brig Washington, and in 1854 in the case of the Grampus, and again in 1870 in the case of the Oneida, which was run down in the early part of that year near the coast of China, and also in the case of the United States steam-ship Huron, lost off the coast of North Carolina in 1877.

"The United States steamer Tallapoosa was run into and sunk at about 11 o'clock on the night of August 21, 1884, in Vineyard Sound. The officers were fully exonerated from any charge of carelessness or negligence, as will be readily seen by a careful perusal of the following communication from the Navy Department, which gives the findings of the board of inquiry convened to investigate the loss of that vessel, and in which is also expressed the opinion of the Department on the report of said board:

"'The findings of the court of inquiry, consisting of Captains D. B. Harmony, R. F. Bradford, and F. M. Bunce, concerning the collision between the naval steamer Tallapoosa and the schooner James S. Lowell, were in substance as follows:

"That on the night of the 21st of August, 1884, about 11 p. m., the Tallapoosa was on her way from Boston to Newport, R. I., off East Chop light in Vineyard Sound, steering her course by the lights; the navigating officer, the officer of the deck, and the commanding officer being on deck, the latter personally in charge of the conduct of the vessel; that the sky was clear, with a haze about the horizon, and a strong breeze blowing from the southwest; the tide flood setting to the eastward, from 1 to 1½ knots an hour; the Tallapoosa steaming against wind and tide, making about 8½ knots over the ground; that when entering the channel between the Hedge Fence and Squash Meadow Shoals, at the point between buoys about 1¾ miles in width, the schooner Lowell was reported one and a half to two points on the starboard bow; that the Lowell was of 700 tons, laden with coal; was moving at a speed of about 9 knots through the water and 10 over the ground, and in about three minutes the vessels were in collision; the Tallapoosa was sunk and the Lowell badly damaged; that on sighting the lights of the schooner the steamer's helm was put to starboard and the steamer steadied when she had fallen off about three-quarters of a point; that constant watch was kept upon the schooner's lights, and suddenly the green light disappeared and only the red could be seen; that the steamer's helm was then put hard to starboard, her whistle blown twice and then sounded repeatedly, but her speed was retained; that she was struck by the schooner about 40 feet from the bow, on the starboard side, at an angle of from 50° to 70° with the line of the keel from the bow; that the schooner on sighting the lights of the steamer one-half point on the port bow, as seen from leeward under the sails, kept her course until the green light of the steamer was seen, then put her helm to port and struck the steamer, as described; that the evidence that the red light of the steamer was seen by the schooner's people soon after her masthead light was disregarded by the court, as the relative positions of the two vessels, as established by each of them, would render it impossible for the red light of the steamer to be at any time visible from the schooner; that the steamer did all that she was able to do in her position to avoid the collision, and complied with the law in every and all respects, as she was in the direct course of the schooner when she first sighted her, and that the schooner, when she saw the green light of the steamer, instead of holding her course, did, by putting her helm to port and altering her course, violate section 4233, Revised Statutes (rules 23 and 24), for preventing collisions. The court is of the opinion, therefore, that the blame for the collision rests with the schooner. The court is glad to add the fact that every effort was made by the people of both vessels to save life.

"'The Navy Department approved the findings above referred to, not relying alone on the testimony of the officers and crew of the Tallapoosa, that they saw the schooner change her course and that her sails were actually shaking when she struck, and that therefore she caused the collision, but basing its approval also upon the admissions in the testimony of the witnesses on the schooner. Master Reed, of the Lowell, testified that before the vessels came together he ordered the helm hard down. Being asked why he gave this manifestly wrong order, he answered, absurdly, that it was because the steamer had shown her green light, from which fact he inferred that she had starboarded her helm. Being asked why he did not, therefore, if he took the responsibility of changing his course, put his helm hard up instead of luffing directly into the steamer, he gave no reason, except that his impression was that 'hardup' or 'hard to starboard' would cause the schooner to strike the steamer amidships, instead of forward, near the bow, when both vessels would go down. The boy at the wheel, twenty years of age, also testified that the captain gave him the order to put the helm hard down, and that he gave her a couple of spokes.

"The statement made and signed by the captain the second morning after the collision was as follows:

"'Statement of Capt. F. K. Reed, schooner James S. Lowell, of Bath.

"'We came into sound and going down on course SE. by E. ½ E., a red light was reported by the watch ahead; before this a white light had been reported ahead, and I knew it was a steamer, and I thought red to red go clear. Suddenly I saw a green light ahead, and I gave the order hard a-port, and we came together about S. from E. buoy on Hedge Fence about 11 p. m., August 21, 1884.

"'F. K. REED.'

"'From this testimony of the schooner's witnesses therefore, the Department decided that if the schooner had kept its course, as she was bound to do, there would have been no collision, and that the change of course on her part and the giving of the directly wrong order by her captain was the sole cause of the collision. The claim made at the trial that, although the order was given to put the helm hard down, this was not done before the collision, is treated by the Department as an aforethought and is disregarded.'

"Your committee report the bill back, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Mr. McKINNEY (during the reading of the report) said: A commission was appointed by the Navy Department to investigate this matter, and a considerable portion of the report is simply an account of the examination by that commission, showing that the crew of the Tallapoosa were in no way to blame for the sinking of the ship. It seems to me unnecessary to read that part of the report.

Mr. SENEY. I think we ought to hear a full statement of the case.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of this report?

Mr. SENEY. From the reading of this report I do not understand that the Government is under any sort of obligation to make payment in these cases. I would prefer, therefore, that this case should come up when it can be more fully discussed.

Mr. KERR. I do not understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] objects absolutely to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SENEY. My object in rising was to object to the further consideration of the bill. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I desire to state as my reason for objecting, that I am unable to perceive, from the reading of this report, upon what principle it can be claimed that the Government is liable to pay any of these men a single penny.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

DANIEL BOND.

The next business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. GLASS) was the bill (H. R. 5853) for the relief of Daniel Bond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Daniel Bond, of Brownsville, Tenn., the sum of $61.80, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on account of the robbing of the post-office at Brownsville, Tenn., of the above sum accruing from the sale of postal stamps.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5853) for the relief of Daniel Bond, of Brownsville, Tenn., have considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following favorable report:

We find by an investigation of the evidence on file in the Post-Office Department that the affidavit of the postmaster discloses the fact that on the night of the 27th of September, 1887, a burglary was committed of the post-office at Brownsville, Tenn., by making an opening through the back door, and the safe in the office being blown to pieces, and that there was taken from the safe $211.10 worth of adhesive stamps and $26.68 of money-order funds, and $61.80 of postal funds. An inspector was sent to make an investigation, and finding the facts as stated in the affidavit of the postmaster recommended the payment of the two items of $211.10 and $26.68. And the same, under the law governing such cases, have been paid, there being no authority under the law to pay the third item of $61.80.

The subject-matter being submitted to the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, he replies as follows: "On examination of the papers filed in the case, this office was of the opinion that the loss had occurred without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, and so advised the Postmaster-General, who allowed Mr. Bond credits of $211.10 for stamps and stamped paper, and $26.68 for money-order funds lost by the burglary.

"There are no records in the possession of the Department from which the amount of postal funds in the possession of a postmaster at any given date can be ascertained; but in this instance the inspector appears to have been satisfied that the amount of postal funds stolen from the postmaster's safe by the burglars is $61.80."

We are of the opinion that the postmaster, Bond, is entitled to relief, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BYNUM. I wish to inquire why this claim was never paid by the Department.

Mr. GLASS. The Department never pays claims of this class, and it is necessary to provide for their payment by special bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. A general bill covering cases of this kind has been recommended by the Postmaster-General, and is now pending, having passed the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN T. ROBERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. MCMILLIN) was the bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Roberson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to John T. Roberson, late consul at Beirut, Syria, Turkey, the sum of $600, with the interest thereon from the — day of ——, 1884, it being the amount paid by said consul for clerk-hire, as had been the custom at said consulate.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims were read, as follows:

In line 5, strike out "Roberson" and insert "Robeson."

After the word "dollars," in line 7, strike out "with the interest thereon from the — day of ——, 1884, it being the amount paid by said consul for clerk-hire, as had been the custom at said consulate."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SHAW) was read, as follows:

It appears from the papers filed in support of this claim that John T. Roberson was appointed United States consul at Beirut, Syria, in 1882, and served in that capacity until February, 1886. The papers also show that at the time he assumed the duties of the position, and up to July, 1884, $600 a year was expended for clerk-hire, that amount having been appropriated by Congress for that use. It also appears that the bill making appropriations for consular and diplomatic purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, failed to provide for clerk-hire at the Beirut consulate; but the business of the consulate still requiring the clerical aid formerly given, the claimant was compelled to provide it at his own personal expense.

He appealed to the Department of State for reimbursement, but no provision having been made therefor, that Department could give him no aid, but he was advised that should he apply to Congress for relief the State Department was ready to recommend an appropriation for the amount claimed, which it has done by the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C., January 23, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 19th instant, I have the honor to say that the statements made by Mr. John T. Robeson, late consul at Beirut, in his petition which accompanies your letter, are in accord with the facts as shown by the records of this Department. No provision was made by Congress for clerk-hire at the Beirut consulate for the fiscal year 1885, and the business of that office positively demanded clerical aid at all seasons. Mr. Robeson's vouchers for $600 for such service would have been accepted by this Department had there been funds to meet them, and I therefore suggest that the petition receive favorable consideration.

A similar inquiry was addressed to the Department by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate nearly a year ago, and a similar answer was addressed to Senator ALLISON, as chairman of that committee, on February 23, 1887.

Returning your inclosures as requested.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. B. A. ENLOE,
House of Representatives.

In view of the foregoing facts your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all that appears in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, after the termination of the word "dollars," in line 7, and also the letter "r" wherever it occurs in the surname of the claimant and that the bill as thus amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I am inclined to object, but before doing so I would like to inquire why this payment was not provided for in some deficiency bill passed by Congress heretofore.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know why it has not been done. All I know concerning the case is that Secretary Bayard has stated that it is proper the claim be paid; that both before and after the year for which this bill proposes to provide payment an appropriation was regularly made for clerk-hire. Why it was not made in that particular year I am unable to say; but Secretary Bayard states that these clerical services were essential to the proper conduct of the office.

Mr. KILGORE. Did not the failure to make an appropriation indicate an intention on the part of Congress to abolish the clerkship?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I can not state.

Mr. KILGORE. Was this clerkship continued after the failure to make the appropriation?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that the appropriation was regularly made both before and after the particular year for which this bill proposes to provide. I will not undertake to say whether it was the intention of Congress in failing to make the appropriation to abolish the clerkship. I am not informed on that point, and would not, of course, mislead the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I believe I will object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman as objecting?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

A. B. NORTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4805) for the relief of A. B. Norton.

Mr. LANHAM. This bill has already been passed and ought not to be on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NEHEMIAH OSBURN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 464) for the relief of Nehemiah Osburn.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Let that bill be considered. There is no need on the part of the Clerk to read the preamble to the bill, as the report will give all the facts involved.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman propose to strike out the preamble?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I simply ask that the preamble be not read at this time, in order to save time, because the report will state the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims, in the due course of business of that court, proceed, freed from any statute of limitations, to the hearing of the claim of Nehemiah Osburn for losses alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of the suspension, by orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, from May 22, 1861, until April 23, 1862; of work under his contract with the said Secretary for the construction of the court-house at Baltimore, and in consequence of the payment for the work done upon said building, and materials furnished therefor by said Osburn, in Treasury notes, instead of the "coin of the United States," as provided by said contract, and to determine whether any and what sum is justly and equitably due to him on account of said claims; and upon such hearing the receipt of said Osburn for the sum of $54,859.79, bearing date the 18th day of April, 1866, and the acceptance of said sum, shall be evidence of the payment of that sum to him in Treasury notes at that date, upon said contract; but inasmuch as he expressly reserved his right to apply to Congress for relief, the said receipt and acceptance shall not be evidence to the acceptance by him of that sum in full payment of the amount due to him on account of said claims, or as a release by him of any right to sue for or otherwise prosecute any claim against the Government on account thereof.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This claim was reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress with certain amendments. It was again reported in this Congress with the same amendments, but through some inadvertence the bill is printed without the amendments. If there be no objection, I ask that those amendments be considered as pending and to be voted on.

To relieve the clerks I will read the report of the committee, if that be agreeable to members. It states facts and gives the reasons why this claimant should be authorized to go to the Court of Claims free from the statute of limitations in a matter involving about $60,000. The claimant is an old man, over eighty years of age, and a resident of my city.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask the gentleman from New York to refrain from reading the entire report. It involves no appropriation, merely referring the case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But I understand from the gentleman from New York that it proposes to relieve this claimant from the statute of limitations.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It does.

Mr. McMILLIN. I also understand the bill proposes to pay the difference between gold and greenbacks at a time when the soldiers were paid in greenbacks.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. But there is an amendment covering that part of the case.

Mr. McMILLIN. The reading of the preamble has been dispensed with, and if we are not to have the report read it will be difficult to understand just exactly what the facts are.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I want to say that every single officer, from Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury when the contract was made, down, have recommended the payment of this claim. Mr. McCulloch, who considered the claim, allowed it. It has been approved by the Supervising Architect and other officers. A technicality arose in court which necessitated his coming to Congress to be relieved from the statute of limitations.

Mr. WEAVER. Do I understand this proposition allows to the party the difference between gold and greenbacks?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. No, sir; the amendment strikes out the words in the bill which are indicated, and in lieu inserts "for any breach on the part of the United States."

Mr. WEAVER. If the Government agreed to pay in coin and paid in greenbacks, that would be a breach of contract.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The contract provided he should be paid in gold.

Mr. WEAVER. So did mine when I went into the Army.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. As I have said, that portion is stricken out. The bill merely authorizes this claimant to go to the Court of Claims relieved from the effect of the statute of limitations, as a matter of pure equity.

Mr. PEEL. How came he to be barred by the statute of limitations?

The report (by Mr. LAIDLAW) is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill 464, for the relief of Nehemiah Osburn, beg leave to submit the following report:

A bill in substance similar to the present bill was introduced into the House in the Forty-ninth Congress and referred to the Committee on Claims of that Congress. That committee reported said bill favorably to the House with certain amendments, which are embraced in the present bill. Said former report was numbered 3930 of the Forty-ninth Congress, second session, a copy of which is hereunto attached.

Your committee adopt said report as their own, except the amendments therein proposed, they being embodied in the present bill, and the committee recommend that the present bill do pass.

[House report No. 3930, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

This claim is for losses growing out of a suspension of work, by order of the Secretary of the Treasury, from May 22, 1861, to April 23, 1862, on the United States court-house in Baltimore, for the construction of which the claimant had entered into an agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury (Howell Cobb), on the 13th of July, 1860. Under this agreement the work was to be done according to plans and specifications which were to be furnished by the Treasury Department, and the court-house was to be delivered to the Government in complete order and condition on or before the 1st day of August, 1862, for the sum of $112,208.04. A copy of the contract, showing its various provisions, is hereto annexed, marked Exhibit A.

It appears that the claimant was a builder of large experience, approved skill, and high personal and financial standing, and that upon the execution of his agreement with the Government he commenced collecting the requisite tools and materials, and engaging a proper force of superintendents, foremen, mechanics, and laborers for the construction of the court-house in its various parts. Among the papers submitted to the committee is a contract, dated at Baltimore, on the 1st of September, 1860, between the claimant, of the one part, and J. B. Stillson as engineer, C. C. Moody as superintendent of granite work, and bookkeeper, Joseph McQuatters as superintendent of mason work, and James Appleyard as superintendent of carpenter and iron work, under which the first two were to receive salaries of $2,000 and the last two $1,500 per annum each for their entire time and services in their several capacities on the said building until its completion. Judging by the reports of the Treasury officers in regard to the manner in which the work was done, and the claimant's accounts were kept, these were men of first-rate ability in their several departments. The work was going on vigorously and prosperously, when it was stopped by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to the claimant from the chief clerk of the construction office, dated May 22, 1862, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked Exhibit B.

The claimant alleges that if it had not been for this suspension he would have finished the building and delivered it to the Government according to contract, and also that he would have had the benefit of the low rates for building materials and labor which prevailed during the period covered by his contract. On these points he is sustained by the acting assistant architect of the Treasury Department (Mr. B. Oertly), who, in a report which he was directed to make by Mr. J. Rogers, Supervising Architect of the same Department, said:

"The contract stipulated for the completion of the building on or before the 1st day of August, 1862. It is probable, if not certain, that the work would have been completed within that time had it not been suspended by direction of the Department, in the spring of 1861. Labor and materials were then abundant and of extraordinary cheapness, and continued so throughout 1861 and the first half of 1862. No difficulty was experienced during this period in procuring transportation for materials, nor from any depreciation of the national currency."

On the 23d of April, 1862, the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the work to be resumed, and within a week thereafter the work was again in progress. The claimant, and the various superintendents with whom he had contracted, as aforesaid, had held themselves in readiness to resume operations, not knowing when resumption would be ordered by the Secretary, and meanwhile the claimant had protested against the suspension, and given notice that he would hold the Government responsible for all the damages he might suffer from this breach of the contract. The claimant's affidavit, and the certificate of the acting engineer in charge of the office of construction (Mr. S. M. Clark) on this point, are printed in the appendix, marked Exhibit C.

In response to the claimant's representations, the Secretary (Mr. Chase) took the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury (Mr. Edward Jordan) upon a statement of facts, dated April 17, 1862, which had been prepared by the Acting Engineer of the Department in charge of the building in Baltimore (Mr. S. M. Clark), and, in answer to the question, "Will the Solicitor state whether the Government is liable to pay damages for the stoppage (contract within)?" the Solicitor replied, "I think the Government is so liable."

Shortly after the resumption of the work the claimant found all the conditions changed: Not only did the cost of labor and materials rapidly advance, and the Treasury notes in which he was paid (despite his protest, instead of "coin") keep declining in value, but transportation became more and more difficult to obtain, and the progress of the work was hindered, while all the expenses of superintendence and labor were prolonged. A brief quotation from the claimant's memorial will show the change which had occurred in the situation:

"Soon after resumption of operations it was found that great difficulties were to be encountered in the successful prosecution of the work, especially in the supply of granite. Previous to the suspension, I was obtaining granite of an approved quality from the Woodstock quarry on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad (20 miles from Baltimore) at 45 cents per cubic foot, delivered in the city yard, but after resuming operations it was impossible to get it from that quarry at any price in sufficient quantities. I obtained permission from the Department to substitute Dix Island (Maine) granite at a cost of from 90 cents to $1 per cubic foot, delivered on the dock. The cost of all other labor and materials increased in about the same ratio."

Notwithstanding these difficulties the claimant continued to push forward the work, and in the fall of 1865 the new court-house was delivered in complete order and condition to the Treasury Department, and accepted by that branch of the Government. Thus the work that was to have been completed, and, in all probability, but for the suspension by order of the Secretary, would have been completed within two years from its commencement, occupied more than double that time. And while the work was in progress after the suspension, although its actual cost was largely in excess of the contract price, all payments to the claimant were made in Treasury notes on the basis of the figures which he had named in his contract, for the different kinds of materials and labor figures fixed by him in 1860 with reference to values in "coin." The last payment which he received under his contract, $6,615.01, on the 16th of June, 1865, would have purchased only $2,943.68, or less than half of the "coin" in which the contract provided that the building should be paid for.

But the differences in value between the Treasury notes in which payments were made to the claimant, while his work was in progress from the summer of 1862 to the summer of 1865, and the "coin" called for by the contract, do not enter into this claim at all, unless the claimant is entitled to interest on these differences from the dates of the various payments until the 18th of April, 1866, when the Treasury Department undertook to make a settlement with him, outside of the contract, by paying him $54,859.79 as a balance due on the actual cost of the work and some allowance for superintendence. The claimant alleges that after these years of arduous labor, embarrassment, and anxiety, during which the Government had the use of more than $100,000 of his capital invested in the increased cost of the court-house, the payment in question still left him loser to a large amount, and that he was compelled to accept the money and sign the release annexed below to save himself from impending financial ruin.

"WASHINGTON, April 18, 1866.

"I acknowledge to have received from the United States Treasury Department the sum of $54,859.79, in full of all claims for work done by me on the new United States court-house at Baltimore, Md., and I hereby agree that the payment of said sum shall be a final settlement of the amount claimed by me from the United States, hereby releasing all rights to sue or otherwise prosecute any claim against the Government, excepting only the right to apply to Congress for such equitable allowance in the premises for damages and loss under my contract with the Treasury Department for the performance of said work as Congress may see fit to make."

It will be noticed in what clear and unmistakable terms the claimant reserved his right to appeal to the equity of Congress.

It now remains to explain the circumstances under which the estimate was made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, upon which the foregoing settlement was had with the claimant.

In the summer of 1865, when the court-house was nearly completed, the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. McCulloch), upon representations from the claimant, had ordered his accounts for all the work which he had done since the stoppage in 1861 to be examined by the Supervising Architect.

This was done and a report of the results was made on the 17th day of August, 1865, by Mr. B. Oertly, acting assistant architect. This report, which is printed in the appendix, marked Exhibit D, shows the total cost of the work from its resumption in May, 1862, until its substantial completion in August, 1865 (including $22,750 paid by the claimant for salaries to his four assistants already named), to have been $167,074.94. To this Mr. Oertly added 20 per cent. for builder's profits ($33,414.98)—the reasons for which allowance he states in his report—and $2,500 for claimant's loss of time and loss of use of tools, etc., during the suspension, making $202,989.92, to which was afterwards added $6,552.78, claimed by the four assistants as salary during the suspension, and making an aggregate of $209,542.70. Deducting for payments made to the claimant during the progress of the work, $100,266.53, there appeared to be a balance due to him of $109,276.17. The claimant's figures showed a balance in his favor of $126,092.67.

A careful examination of Mr. Oertly's report leaves the impression of thoroughness, fairness, and moderation. His percentage for builder's profits, under the circumstances which he states, being 5 per cent. less than the maximum and 5 per cent. more than the usual allowance, fell $7,000 short of the profits which the claimant shows by a tabulated statement he would have made on the original contract if the work had not been suspended.

On the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, Congress appropriated $109,000 to pay the claimant; but the question having been raised while the bill was on its passage whether the Secretary had power to make such a settlement, a proviso was added that no part of the sum should be paid by way of damages (14 Stats., pp. 17-25). Subsequently—although nothing seems to have been allowed by way of damage in Mr. Oertly's computation, which was rather an ascertainment of the quantum valebat—another accounting was ordered, and the balance found due to the claimant was fixed at $54,859.79, and paid to him under the circumstances already stated.

The profits which he would have made on the original contract do not seem to have been of a speculative or uncertain kind. He was prevented from realizing these profits, or any profits, by no fault of his, but by the action of the Government; and under the settlement, to which, as he claims, he was compelled by his necessities to submit, he seems to have been left with nothing but his labor (and actual losses besides) for his pains.

The Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. McCulloch) earnestly recommended this claim to the favorable attention of the Committee on Claims. Three of his letters on the subject are printed in the appendix, marked Exhibit E. The Secretary, who made the settlement, says expressly that nothing was allowed for damages. The claimant immediately thereafter memorialized Congress, and a bill was introduced to pay him $60,209.93, but no action seems to have been taken upon it. Subsequently he was advised that the receipt and release of April 18, 1866 (supra), would not estop him, and he accordingly brought an action in the Court of Claims, which he was afterwards advised to abandon, on the ground that without an act of Congress relieving him from the effect of the receipt he would in all probability be defeated.

He accordingly discontinued his action, and betook himself again to Congress. Bills for his relief have been introduced at various sessions, but no action has been taken until now. It seems to the committee that he is entitled to a judicial determination of his claim freed from the statute of limitation and the effect of the release.

The considerations which have brought your committee to this conclusion may be condensed as follows:

1. There is no controversy, and can be none, regarding the fact that the Government, by written orders, suspended this work as above indicated, and that this suspension resulted in extending the completion of the work from August 1, 1862, to November, 1865.

2. It is not disputed, and can not be, that the contractor was required to, and did, hold himself and his employés in readiness during this period of suspension to complete this work, and was subjected to the expenses incident to so holding himself in readiness.

3. He faithfully executed his contract in every particular, notwithstanding the hindrances to which he was subjected by the Government.

4. It is thoroughly settled by the decisions of the courts, that where the Government thus interferes with the execution of a contract, and by such interference makes the work more expensive to the contractor, or deprives him of the legitimate profits which he could have made and was entitled to make under his contract, there is a liability at common law resulting against the Government from such suspension of or interference with the contract. Among the many cases which might be cited are the following:

Smoot & Spicer's cases, 8 Court of Claims, 96, in which it was held (and afterwards affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court, 15 Wallace, 36) that "the principles which must govern the liability of the Government in an action for breach of contract are the same as if the contract were between individuals." In Figh & Gindrat's case (8 Court of Claims 319) it was held that "where the Government suspends work under a contract, and the contractors comply with the Government's request, both in suspending work and subsequently resuming it, they may recover all their actual damages occasioned by the suspension, including loss occasioned by the non-employment of their hands, by an advance of wages, and by the loss of lumber washed away and stolen."

In Harvey & Livesey's case (8 Court of Claims, 501) it is held that where the Government wrongfully declares a contract forfeited the contractor's damages are "the profits which he might have made if allowed to perform." (See also United States vs. Smith, 94 United States, 214; Parish vs. United States, 100 United States, 500; and United States vs. Mueller, 113 United States, 153.)

In United States vs. Smith (supra) the Supreme Court held that "the United States can be required to make compensation for damages (to the contractor) which he had actually sustained by its default in the performance of its undertakings to him," and that the measure of damages was such a sum as "was necessary to place Smith in the same condition he would have been in if he had been allowed to proceed without interference."

5. The claimant in this case has been guilty of no laches, but has diligently prosecuted his claim in every way open to him.

6. From these facts it plainly results that if this interference of the Government has resulted in loss, which is not covered by what has been paid to him, then a right of action would exist against the Government for whatever that loss may be, and this upon the principles of familiar law as well as obvious equity.

The only question left, therefore, is whether, under the conditions stated, it is just for the Government to insist upon the alleged technical effect of the receipt above named and of the statute of limitations? Congress has frequently granted relief even when the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States, upon appeal, has rendered judgment against the claimants. One or two instances will suffice. In Adams's case (2 Court of Claims, 86) the claimant recovered judgment for $112,748.86, but the judgment was reversed on appeal to the Supreme Court (7 Wall., 463).

Congress, however, appropriated $112,748.86 for the relief of the claimant (17 Stats., 713). In that case the claimant had given a receipt "in full," which, the Supreme Court held, barred his right to recover. In Albert Grant's case (5 Court of Claims, 86) judgment on his claim of $46,493.73 "for all damages" was in favor of the United States, but Congress (17 Stats., 699) provided for relief to the plaintiff to the extent of $47,000 for those same damages.

The present bill does not decide anything in favor of Mr. Osburn, but leaves all questions of right of recovery to the Court of Claims, with an appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States. The only thing which the pending bill accomplishes in favor of the claimant is to deliver him from the statute of limitations and from the alleged release. The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 9252), amended so that it will read as indicated.

APPENDIX.

EXHIBIT A.—Contract between Nehemiah Osburn and the United States of America.

This contract made and entered into by and between Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, for and on account of the United States of America, of the first part, and Nehemiah Osburn, of Rochester, N. Y., to whom was awarded the contract for the entire construction of the building authorized to be constructed at Baltimore, Md., as a court-house for the United States courts, on his bid for the same, received under the advertisement of the Treasury Department, dated March 1, A. D. 1860, of the second part, witnesseth that the party of the second part covenants and agrees to and with the party of the first part, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to furnish and deliver all the materials and do and perform all the work required for the entire construction of the said court-house, agreeable to the original drawings and specifications, under the direction of the superintendent to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose, and in conformity to the lithographed copies of the drawings of the several parts thereof, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and the printed specifications, according to the general conditions appended thereto, prepared at the office of the construction of buildings, under the Treasury Department, and dated April 14, A. D. 1860, a copy of which is hereunto attached, and which together with the drawings aforesaid, are made a part of this contract, equally binding as if more particularly incorporated herewith, the whole subject to such omissions, additions, and alterations as may be determined upon by the said party of the first part, as provided in the "general conditions" of the specifications hereto annexed.

And the said party of the second part further agrees and binds himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to do and complete the entire work according to the plans and specifications aforesaid, and to the approval and acceptance of the said superintendent, to be appointed as aforesaid, and deliver the same over to the said superintendent in complete and proper condition, conformably to the plans and specifications aforesaid, on or before the 1st day of August, 1862.

And the said party of the first part, acting for and in behalf of the United States, doth covenant, promise, and agree well and truly to pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of $112,808.04, good and lawful money of the coin of the United States, the payments to be made in the following manner, namely:

Ninety per cent. (nine-tenths) of the value of work done and materials furnished (said amount to be ascertained and duly certified to the Department by the superintendent), will, in consideration of the premises, be paid from time to time as the work progresses; and 10 per cent. (one-tenth) will be retained until the completion of the work, and its approval and acceptance as aforesaid by the said superintendent, which shall be forfeited by said party of the second part in the event of the non-fulfillment to the entire satisfaction of said superintendent of this contract.

And it is further agreed by and between the parties to these presents that if, from any cause whatever, the said party of the second part should fail to carry on the work with the required promptness, in the opinion of the said superintendent, to insure its completion by the time specified above, it shall become the duty of the said superintendent, and he shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, after eight days' due notice thereof in writing, left at the shop, office, or usual place of abode of the said party of the second part, or with his agent, without effect, to purchase and procure the necessary materials, and have the necessary work performed, to supply any deficiency caused by the delinquency of the said party of the second part, and the actual cost thereof, together with 15 per cent. thereon, shall be deducted from any moneys due or owing to the said party of the second part on account of this contract, and if there is not that amount due him, then his bondsmen are to be held liable for any deficiency, to be recovered of them by suit in the name of the United States.

It is also covenanted and agreed between the parties of this contract that the party of the second part shall execute, with two or more good and sufficient sureties, a bond to the United States in the sum of $30,000, to be paid in liquidated damages, conditioned for the faithful performance of this contract, and the agreements and covenants herein made by the said party of the second part.

It is also covenanted, agreed, and understood that no member of Congress or other person whose name is not at this time disclosed, shall be admitted to any interest in this contract; and in the event of the Department becoming satisfied that any other party or parties than the signer or signers hereto have either a contingent or direct interest therein, which may appear to the party of the first part to be prejudicial to the interest of the work or of the Government, then the said Secretary shall be, and he hereby is, empowered to cancel this contract and relet the same, and if any work shall have been performed or material delivered for the said building, on which 90 per cent. (nine-tenths) has been paid, the 10 per cent. (one-tenth) retained thereon shall be forfeited to the Government.

It is further covenanted and agreed by the parties hereto that this contract shall not be assigned except by consent of the Secretary of the Treasury; and that any assignment thereof, except as aforesaid, will be a forfeiture of the same, and shall subject the said party of the second part, and his bondsmen, to such damages, to be recovered of them by suit in the name of the United States, as shall have been suffered by the said party of the first part.

It is further agreed and understood that all the stones used in the said building shall be laid upon their natural or quarry beds, and whatever style of dressing shall be adopted shall be in the best manner of that style; and all the materials used shall be of the best quality of their kind, and the work thereon shall be of the best character, and to the entire satisfaction of the said superintendent.

It is also covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that, in case any additions, omissions, or alterations are determined upon, the value thereof shall be estimated by the superintendent, in accordance, as near as practicable, with the original bid of the parties of the second part, and the amount so estimated by him shall be deemed and taken to be the agreed upon and liquidated sum to be added or deducted for such additions, omissions, or alterations, and shall be specifically noted hereon, and be final and conclusive between the parties hereto.

It is also covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that if any material shall be delivered on the site of the said court-house at Baltimore, Md., by the party of the second part, and estimated and a percentage paid thereon by the party of the first part before they are put in the building, they shall become the property of the United States, and being delivered to the superintendent, shall be worked into the building as it progresses.

In witness whereof, the said Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid, for and in behalf of the United States, hath hereunto subscribed his name, and caused the seal of the Treasury Department to be hereunto affixed, and the said Nehemiah Osburn has also subscribed his name and affixed his seal, this 30th day of July, A. D. 1860. HOWELL COBB.

EXHIBIT B.—Order suspending the work.

BALTIMORE, MD., May 22, 1861.

SIR: I am instructed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury to direct you to cease all work under your contract for the construction of the Baltimore court-house at the close of this day, Wednesday, 22d of May, 1861.

In thus directing a cessation of work under the contract it is deemed that your ultimate interest will be promoted, inasmuch as the present obstruction upon means of transport in your vicinity renders the conveyance of material to the building site a work of much hazard, difficulty, and delay.

Due notice will be given you when the work can be resumed, and the time for completing your contract will be extended a corresponding period.

The custody of the property now on the building site and on the lots on Holliday and Frederick streets is placed in the collector of the port, and you will please make an inventory thereof and hand it to the collector, together with the keys of the premises, taking his receipt therefor.

Very respectfully, S. M. CLARK, C. C.,
Office of Construction.

NEHEMIAH OSBURN, Esq.,
Contractor, Baltimore, Md.

EXHIBIT C.

I, N. Osburn, of Rochester, N. Y., do hereby testify that on the 1st day of June, 1860, a contract was awarded to me by the Treasury Department of the United States for building a new United States court-house at Baltimore, Md. That in pursuance thereof, on the 1st September, 1860, I commenced operations, and was progressing satisfactorily, when, on the 22d May, 1861, I was ordered to suspend work until further orders. That I protested against such stoppage, as I had prepared my outfit of tools, etc., to complete the work.

That on the 1st May, 1862, I was ordered to recommence the work, upon receipt of which I called upon the acting engineer in charge of the Treasury Department and protested verbally to him against being compelled to go on with the work, and was assured by him that I should be paid all damages arising out of the suspension of the work, and that my accounts could be adjusted satisfactorily on its completion.

N. OSBURN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day, the 30th January, 1868.
CHAS. C. COX, J. P.

Certificate of acting engineer in charge.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 30, 1868.

I have read the within [above] affidavit, and hereby certify that the facts as to the contract, the suspension of the work, and its subsequent resumption are true as therein alleged.

As to the alleged conversation with me at the time of the resumption of the work, I can not, at this late date, make positive averment of its correctness, as the details of conversations have passed out of my memory. I recollect, however, that Mr. Osburn had many conversations with me at the time in reference to the extra amount due him by reason of the suspension, and I also recollect that it was my decided impression at the time that an extra amount was due him (how much I expected to ascertain when the work was completed), and I therefore do not doubt that his allegations in that regard are also true.

S. M. CLARK,
Formerly Acting Engineer in Charge, Office of Construction.

EXHIBIT D.—Report of Assistant Architect Oertly on claimant's account.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
August 17, 1865.

SIR: In accordance with your request of the 26th ultimo, the contractor of the United States court-house at Baltimore, Md., N. Osburn, esq., submitted to me for inspection his account-books, subcontracts, vouchers, and other papers relating to the cost of the erection of the above court-house, with a view to facilitate the investigation of his claim, presented by him to the honorable Secretary on the 15th ultimo, and referred to this office. A schedule of the books and papers submitted by him is herewith attached, together with his affidavit testifying to their genuineness, and making oath that they fully exhibit the expenditures made and liabilities incurred by him on account of said work.

The documents begin with the starting of the work and extend up to the present time. The accounts seem to have been kept scrupulously careful. I have examined the same from the date of the suspension, May 22, 1861, thoroughly, assisted by C. C. Moody, esq., who acted as book-keeper and assistant to N. Osburn. The result of my examination is embodied in the tabular statement annexed to this, and shows expenditures and liabilities of N. Osburn on account of the work since its suspension; it also includes a few small amounts for sundry unfinished work, which will be completed within a few days.

To facilitate the comparison of the contractor's statement with mine, I arrange the subdivision of my table similar to his.

The expenditures and liabilities enumerated by items 1 to 17, both inclusive, constituted the total prime cost of the work, except contingent expenses, since its suspension, and amount to $144,324.94.

Tabular statement of expenditures made and liabilities incurred by N. Osburn, esq., contractor, on account of the erection of the United States court-house at Baltimore, Md., since the suspension of the work, May 22, 1861, until its completion, August, 1865.

* At the time of the suspension of the work, the tools and building materials of the contractors were placed under the custody of the collector, who put a watchman over them. Notwithstanding this, a number of valuable tools and over 600 yards of sand were stolen, and some 40,000 bricks destroyed.

† No superintendent of the work was appointed since its resumption, and in consequence thereof the contractors were obliged to visit Washington very frequently for consultation about plans and the payment of monthly estimates. The Government saved some $6,000 by this arrangement.

Tabular statement of expenditures made, etc.—Continued.

	Names.	Employment.	Salaries per annum from May 1, 1882, to August 1, 1885.	Amount.
18	J. B. Stillson	Engineer	At $2,000	$6,500
	C. C. Moody	Book-keeper and architect	2,000	6,500
	——Appleyard	Foreman of iron work and carpentry	1,500	4,875
	——McQuatters	Foreman of masonry and labor	1,500	4,875
	Total			22,750

Item No. 18, amounting to $22,750, is for salaries to one engineer (J. B. Stillson), at $2,000 per annum; one book-keeper (C. C. Moody) and draughtsman, at $2,000 per annum; one foreman for masonry and labor, at $1,500 per annum (J. McQuatters); and one foreman for iron work and carpentry (J. Appleyard), at $1,500 per annum.

These gentlemen had been in the employ of Mr. Osburn for several years previous to the commencement of the Baltimore court-house, and when he received the contract for this work, entered into an agreement with him (copy of which is annexed to this), according to which they were to assist him at the above rates until the completion of the work. These salaries, paid to them by N. Osburn, were liberal, but not extravagant, and if the work had not been suspended, their total amount would not have exceeded the usual 10 per cent. on prime cost allowed for such services. The contract stipulated for the completion of the building on or before the 1st of August, 1862.

It is probable, if not certain, that the work would have been completed within that time had it not been suspended by direction of the Department in the spring of 1861.

Labor and materials were then abundant and of extraordinary cheapness, and continued so throughout 1861 and the first half of 1862.

No difficulty was experienced during this period in procuring transportation for materials, nor from any depreciation of the national currency.

When the work was resumed in May, 1863, matters had not materially changed, labor and materials were still low, and a speedy collapse of the rebellion was then confidently expected.

To these facts must it be attributed that Mr. Osburn did not decline to resume the work, and that he had made no new arrangements with the gentlemen named, he had, under the circumstances, reasons for expecting an early completion of the work.

Unfortunately all these premises should prove fallacious. The failure of the first campaign against Richmond and the subsequent invasion of Maryland suddenly and completely changed the state of business. Granite could no more be procured (except at long intervals) for want of transportation, the War Department assuming complete control of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and labor became very scarce and high.

These difficulties, and especially the one from the depreciation of the currency, kept increasing until the beginning of this year. Even had Osburn not been financially embarrassed by the total insufficiency of the payments made to him he would have been powerless to overcome the obstacles, in consequence of which the completion of the work required three years and six months, in place of one year and three months as expected. Hence the heavy rates of 15.7 per cent. of the above contingent expenses to prime cost of the work.

The above gentlemen also claim payment for the time from the suspension of the work, May 22, 1861, up to its resumption, April 23, 1862 (amounting to $6,552.78). This claim is not included in my statement, though the contractor furnishes the opinion of counsel that he is liable for the amount.

The work done on and the materials furnished for the Baltimore United States court-house by Mr. Osburn are excellent, fully up to all the requirements of the contract and to his reputation as a conscientious builder; it also must be admitted that his bargains and transactions were economical and judicious.

Considering the length of time Mr. Osburn's money has been disadvantageously laid out for the benefit of the Government, and the many difficulties and anxieties he has been subjected to, I should think it but equitable to add a somewhat higher rate of builder's profit than the Department has been in the habit of allowing to contractors. Sworn measurers and standard guide-books on the value of artificers' work allow builder's profit varying from 10 to 25 per cent. on contractor's actual expenditures; the Department has heretofore been in the habit of allowing 15 per cent., and I think that in this case the rate ought to be increased to 20 per cent.

If it should be considered that the Department has the right to adjust N. Osburn's claim, I think that the following condensed statement would exhibit a fair, equitable settlement of his accounts, namely:

Actual cost of labor (other than for contingent services) performed on and of material furnished for the United States court-house at Baltimore, since the suspension of work, May 22, 1861, until its completion		$144,324.94
Contingent services from May 1, 1862, to August 1, 1865		22,750.00
Twenty per cent. of builders' profits		33,414.98
For loss of time and loss of his use of tools, etc., during the suspension		2,500.00
		202,989.92
Deduct total of payments made on the above since May 1, 1862		100,266.56
		102,723.39

To this should be added the amount for contingent services from May 22, 1861, to May 1, 1862, if it should be found that Mr. Osburn is really liable for the same.

The total amount claimed by the contractor is $126,002.67.

The original contract work remaining undone when the work was suspended, May 22, 1861, amounted to $91,951.39, and the extra work ordered at various times $9,314.96. From this it will be seen that if the account of N. Osburn, esq., should be settled on the basis of the above statement, that the cost (to the Government) of the work done since the suspension would be nearly double of its cost at the rates of the contract.

The balance of the appropriation remaining available is $17,893.54. Out of this amount $10,962.93 will shortly fall due to Messrs. Pottier & Stymus, for furniture, carpets, matting, and curtains, ordered May 12 last, leaving $6,846.61 towards the final settlement of N. Osburn's account.

Very respectfully,

B. OERTLY, Acting Assistant Architect.

J. ROGERS, Esq.,
Supervising Architect, Treasury Department.

EXHIBIT E.

Secretary McCulloch to the claimant.

JULY 23, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Upon carefully looking over the settlement heretofore made with you upon your claim as contractor for the building of the Baltimore court-house, I am forced to the conclusion that I have no authority to alter or waive the provisions of the release or receipt which you then executed. Nothing could be allowed to you under the appropriation act approved April 7, 1866, except it should be certified by the Attorney-General to be legal, just, and proper, and he, in an opinion given in another and similar case, as well as in conversation in regard to your case, seems to have been of the opinion that no claim of damages for the discontinuance of work upon the building could be legally allowed.

The settlement made with you, proceeding upon this basis, excluded those claims for damage, allowing you only for work actually done, which was all it was thought could be allowed under the Attorney-General's opinion, or which he could certify to be legally due. I can readily conceive that the discontinuance of the work caused you actual and real loss, but there seems to be no other course for you now to pursue except to make application to Congress for relief, in accordance with the right reserved in the release which you executed. If you desire to pursue this course, withdrawing your letter of the 29th of May last, I shall take pleasure in recommending your application to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Very respectfully,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary.

N. OSBURN, Esq.

Secretary McCulloch to the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 5, 1866.

SIR: At the request of Mr. N. Osburn, I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Claims to his claim for damages, caused by the suspension of work on the United States court-house in Baltimore, Md., as shown by the papers herewith transmitted, from which it will be seen that while the claimant abandoned his right to apply to the courts for damages, he reserved his right to apply to Congress for such compensation as might seem equitable and just.

Very respectfully,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

Second letter from Secretary McCulloch to the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 17, 1867.

SIR: On the 5th of June I inclosed for the consideration of your committee certain papers in regard to the claim of N. Osborn, contractor for the erection of the United States court-house in Baltimore, Md., for damages for the suspension of the work by the order of this Department, dated May 10, 1861, which suspension taking place at a time when material and labor was extremely low, prevented him from taking advantage of the favorable rates then current, and compelled him to complete the building at a time when the prices of both had much advanced, causing, I am satisfied, a material loss to him.

It will be seen from the receipt of Mr. Osburn (a copy of which was transmitted) that while the various claims arising under the contract have been finally adjusted, nothing has been paid him for the damages he has suffered from the action of the Department aforesaid.

The appropriation for the settlement of his accounts approved April 7, 1866, did not, in the opinion of this Department, authorize any payment whatever for damages.

Mr. Osburn having withdrawn his letter of the 29th of May, 1866, and satisfactorily explained the reasons that induced him to sign it, I desire to withdraw the letter of this Department, dated June 11, 1866, in relation thereto, and submit his claims to your favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. C. DELANO, Chairman Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Now, the officers of the Government, every one of them, without exception, have recommended the payment of any legal indebtedness existing on the part of the United States Government to this claimant, but the difficulty in the way is the statute of limitations, and the effect of the release he gave for the fifty-odd thousand dollars paid him.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from New York before consent is given to laying this bill aside. The gentleman stated, I believe, that Mr. Howell Cobb, a member of the Cabinet, recommended the allowance of the claim.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. No, I stated the contract was made by Howell Cobb in July, 1860, when he was a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I did not so understand the statement. Will the gentleman please explain the release to which he has referred?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I will read that portion of the report again.

[The portion of the report referred to by Mr. BAKER, was again read.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This was in 1860, I believe?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. We have had no explanation as to the merits of this claim. I would like to know something about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I consent that an explanation shall be given, subject to the right to object.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I wish it distinctly understood that after I have stated all the facts in connection with the case, if any gentleman objects to the consideration of the bill, I can only say "Amen," for I have examined it carefully, and know it to be only right and just.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Let me ask my colleague if this bill is not simply for the purpose of giving his constituent a standing in court and a day in court?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I can read that portion of the report which gives the facts in reference to the case perhaps in less time than it will take to explain it.

Mr. BYNUM. I object to the consideration of this bill. There is no use in taking up the time in discussing it further.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I want to say that I am sorry to have my friend object without hearing the case.

Mr. BYNUM. I have heard the case. This party has received compensation, and gave a receipt in full for it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. He gave a receipt in full, but that receipt, if the gentleman will examine it, reserves the right to ask Congress for relief for damages, and reserves the right to prosecute any claim against the Government.

Mr. BYNUM. I have heard the reading of that receipt.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Then I know my friend does not mean to insist upon his objection.

Mr. BYNUM. I see no reason to withdraw the objection, and insist upon it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will this bill retain its place upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Some time subsequently

Mr. BAKER, of New York, said: I understand the gentleman from Indiana is willing to withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BYNUM. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. COBB. I renew it.

JOHN T. ROBERSON.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the bill to which I made objection just now, I find, on talking with some of my friends on this side, that it is a meritorious claim, in consequence of which I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What is the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6494) for the relief of John T. Roberson.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the bill be read.

Mr. LANHAM. It has been already reported at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. CARUTH. This is a bill to pay for clerical hire at a consulate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well; I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is before the committee and the question is on the amendments which have been submitted by the Committee on Claims, and which have been read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think it is proper to adopt the last amendment, because it has not been the policy of the Government to pay interest.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

G. W. M'ADAMS.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri) was the bill (H. R. 4765) for the relief of G. W. McAdams.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General of the United States is hereby authorized to release and relieve George W. McAdams, postmaster at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and his sureties, of all responsibility and liability to the Government for funds and property of the Government stolen from said post-office on the night of July —, 1865, by burglars: Provided, That he shall, upon examination, find that such loss was without negligence, fault, or blame on the part of said postmaster.

The report (by Mr. KERR) is as follows:

Your committee being satisfied that no danger can arise to the Government under the provisions of the bill submitting the question of negligence, fault, and blame to the Postmaster-General for his determination, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN J. CROOKE.

The next bill on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL) was the bill (H. R. 2696) for the relief of John J. Crooke.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,611.44 to John J. Crooke, for services rendered in imprinting internal-revenue stamps upon tin-foil tobacco wrappers, from the 1st day of July, 1884, to the 7th day of October, 1884.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

Your committee report that the bill herewith was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary referred the same to the Commissioner, who reported that there was an equitable claim due the claimant of the amount provided in the bill.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the same.

Copy of report or letter of Commissioner is herewith attached.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 26, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry at this office yesterday in regard to application of Mr. John J. Crooke, of New York, for relief from Congress on account of money stated to be due him for imprinting internal-revenue stamps upon foil wrappers for tobacco, I have to state that under a contract entered into between Mr. Crooke and this office, and which was in force July 1, 1884, Mr. Crooke was entitled to receive compensation at the rate of 14 cents per thousand for stamps so imprinted.

Upon presentation of his bill for such imprinting for the month of July, 1884, amounting to $463.74, it was referred August 14, 1884, to the accounting officers of the Treasury for payment.

Upon October 18, 1884, this office was notified by the First Comptroller of the Treasury of the disallowance of Mr. Crooke's bill for July, for the reason that the appropriation for printing stamps for the year ended June 30, 1885, provided for the payment for only such stamps as should be printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. (23 Statutes, 204.)

It is found on examination of the records of this office that there is due Mr. Crooke for imprinting stamps, under his contract, the sum of $1,611.45 for stamps imprinted from July 1, 1884, to October 7, 1884, inclusive.

Mr. Crooke entered into a contract for the imprinting of internal-revenue stamps on and after October 8, 1884, without charge or expense to the Government.

I inclose a copy of a letter addressed by this office, under date of April 10, 1886, to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of applications of Mr. Crooke for relief from Congress (House bills 7341, 7342, 7343). I have no reason to change the recommendations made in that letter.

There are no papers on file in this office which will furnish any information other than is contained in this communication and that of April 10, inclosed.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. S. MILLER, Commissioner.

Hon. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York as to what amount is recommended by the bill? I did not catch the reading of it.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Sixteen hundred and eleven dollars.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I remember to have investigated the question in the last Congress, when it was before the Committee on Ways and Means, and we found that amount was due.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SUFFERERS BY WRECK OF STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

Mr. MCKINNEY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] withdraws his objection to the bill which I presented here awhile ago (S. 869) for the relief of sufferers by the wreck of the Tallapoosa.

Mr. SENEY. If it be the desire of the House to consider at this time the bill called up by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] I will withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there further objection?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to make a statement, subject to the right to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4573) to provide for the adjustment of the accounts of Edwin A. Merritt.

Mr. LONG. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. KERR. I wish to say in regard to the bill called up by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that it was carefully examined by the committee, and that there are precedents for it. We examined testimony and found that the amounts allowed these various members of the crew was simply the value of their outfit, which was inevitably destroyed when the vessel went down.

Mr. HOLMAN. What was the outfit?

Mr. KERR. A thousand dollars for each of the officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. But what did that cover?

Mr. KERR. It covered in each case about a dozen suits of clothes, epaulettes, hammocks, and everything of that kind—the whole paraphernalia of a naval officer.

Mr. MCKINNEY. There were forty of these sailors.

Mr. KERR. There were four officers and forty sailors.

Mr. MCKINNEY. These forty sailors that lost their entire outfit were in the service of the Government. They were in no sense responsible for the sinking of the vessel, and I think they ought to be compensated for their loss.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this statement is made subject to the right to object to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The gentleman from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. MCKINNEY. These men, I say, lost their entire outfit. They were poor men, and it seems to me perfectly just that they should be allowed at least the value of the outfit which they lost. The vessel lay under the water long enough to destroy entirely everything they possessed. We do not ask that they shall be allowed for anything except what they absolutely lost while they were in the service of the Government. Now there is, or there will be, objection made to one part of the bill, and so far as that part is concerned I am willing that the bill shall be amended. It is where it says, "The widow, child, or children, or in case there be not such, then the parent or parents, or if there be no parents, then the brothers and sisters, etc." One gentleman on the floor has stated that he will object to including brothers and sisters, and if the committee will permit, I am willing that that shall be struck out, although if no objection were made to it I would rather let it stand so as to avoid the necessity for sending the bill back to the Senate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is there not a provision in the general law for compensating sailors who lose their effects by accidents of this kind?

Mr. KERR. I understand that there is.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What is it?

Mr. KERR. There is some sort of provision, but what it is I do not know exactly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I searched for it a year ago, but could not find it.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is some provision on the subject.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that there are two cases cited in the report where seamen lost their property and the Government reimbursed them.

Mr. KILGORE. Those were cases where the families of the men who were lost were reimbursed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman from New York is speaking of property now.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that if there ever was a proper and charitable case presented to any Congress this is such a case, and the claim ought to be paid. The loss of the vessel was not any fault of these men, and they ought to be compensated for their loss.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What amounts were allowed to the sailors in the cases which are cited as precedents?

Mr. KERR. The same amount as in this bill.

Mr. MCKINNEY. The allowance in the bill for each officer is $1,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What is it based upon?

Mr. MCKINNEY. It is based upon the investigation of the facts. The testimony shows that it would require $1,000 to replace their clothes, their swords, and all the property that they lost. That is what the allowance is based upon.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We passed several such bills in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think that is a very liberal allowance for personal effects. This kind of legislation carries the Government into the insurance business, and if officials take with them to sea more than is necessary for the actual service, I do not believe that the Government ought to insure their property. I suggest therefore to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] that he let this allowance for the officers be fixed at $500, which perhaps may not cover all the property they lost, but will cover it so far as the Government could reasonably be expected to incur risks for their benefit.

Mr. MCKINNEY. If the committee do not object, I am willing to have the bill amended in line 13 by striking out "one thousand" and inserting "five hundred." That will make the allowance to each officer $500.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is recognized.

Mr. COBB. I have been trying to get in a word on this matter for some time. I think this bill is wrong in principle. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL] hit the nail squarely on the head when he said awhile ago that it was a very charitable case. That is what it is, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. LANHAM. He did not use the word "charitable" in the same sense that you do.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. No, I did not mean it in that sense. [Laughter.] These men were in the employ of the Government, and if the Secretary of the Navy had ordered that vessel to the most dangerous point on the ocean they would have had to obey orders.

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. And they did obey orders, and the result was that they lost all their property and very nearly lost their lives. The chief engineer was about nine hours in the rigging before he was taken off by a schooner. Furthermore, they were compelled by law to have a certain amount of clothing and equipment attached to their positions in the Navy when they went to sea. That statement was made and verified before the Committee on Claims, not only before the subcommittee, but before the full committee.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, is this bill under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. This entire proceeding is by unanimous consent. Is there further objection to the consideration of this bill, in view of the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] as to the amendments which he is willing to have made?

Mr. COBB. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, it is not exactly fair to members of this House to call upon them to make these peremptory objections without giving them an opportunity to state their reasons.

It puts them in a bad position, and the moment an objection is made the objector is surrounded by gentlemen specially interested, so that he can not hear what is going on because of the appeals that are made to him. It puts a member in a false attitude. Now, everything that the gentleman from New York has said may be true——

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. It is true.

Mr. COBB. It may be true that this was a dangerous enterprise, but these men entered upon it knowing the danger and the responsibility. This bill simply proposes that the United States Government shall become an insurer of the property of officers of the Navy. That is the whole of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GEORGE F. ROBERTS AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. HOWARD) was the bill (H. R. 2127) for the relief of George F. Roberts and others.

The bill was read.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Let us hear the report, subject to objection.

Mr. FINLEY. I object to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope before objection is made the report will be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report covers six pages.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can explain the case briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY] has objected.

GEORGE B. HANSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims (called up by Mr. VOORHEES) was the bill (H. R. 5336) for the relief of George B. Hansell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George B. Hansell, of Washington, D. C., the sum of $373, or so much thereof as he may find to be required to pay the necessary and actual traveling expenses incurred by him in traveling from Sitka, Alaska, to Washington, D. C., after his discharge from the United States revenue-marine service, in 1870; and that the said sum of $373, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, be appropriated for the purposes of this act.

Mr. SENEY. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the gentleman will allow me, I can state briefly the single point embraced in this case.

Mr. SENEY. I much prefer to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. SHAW) was read, as follows:

This bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims to the House of Representatives during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. That report so fully sets forth the facts upon which the claim is based, that your committee adopt said report and make it part hereof, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2915) for the relief of George B. Hansell, having carefully considered the same, report:

That the claimant in 1862 was a resident of Washington, D. C., and was commissioned third lieutenant in the United States revenue-marine service. In 1867 he was made a second lieutenant in the same service; that while serving as such second lieutenant he was ordered to report to Washington, D. C., for examination and promotion. He reported for examination; after the examination he was ordered to report for duty to the United States revenue-cutter Reliance, then on the Pacific coast. These orders he obeyed.

In September, 1870, while returning in the Reliance to Sitka, Alaska, from a cruise in the Arctic waters, he found awaiting him a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury dismissing him from the service. That letter was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 19, 1870.

SIR: Having failed to pass the professional examination prescribed by this Department, and the Senate of the United States having confirmed the nomination of your successor, I am directed by the President to inform you that your commission as second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States is revoked, and your services as such will cease and terminate with the receipt of this letter.

I am, very respectfully,

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury,

Second Lieut. G. B. HANSELL,
Revenue-Cutter Reliance, Sitka, Alaska.

Lieutenant Hansell thus found himself discharged at a point distant and remote from his home. He claims that he was compelled to expend the sum of $373 in order to reach his home (Washington, D. C.) from Sitka, Alaska, where he was dismissed.

The cause of his dismissal was "failure to pass the professional examination" prescribed by the Treasury Department. It will be observed that after he had reported to Washington for such examination, and had undergone the same, he was ordered for duty to the Pacific coast. He was discharged from the date of the receipt of the letter. Had he been discharged while at the most distant point while on the cruise to Alaska, it would seem that equity and fair dealing to this officer would entitle him to transportation to his home. He claimed his traveling expenses from the Treasury Department. The answer of the Department was:

"That he (Hansell) was dropped from the service at Sitka, Alaska, and that no authority for traveling expenses was contained in the letter of the Department sent to him at the time; there is accordingly no legal basis for his claim."

The committee are of the opinion, while there may be no legal basis for the claim, that justice demands that he be paid his actual and necessary traveling expenses from Sitka, Alaska, to his home at Washington, D. C.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended as follows: After the word "dollars," in line 7, insert the words "or so much thereof as he may find to be required to pay the necessary and actual traveling," and in line 7 strike out the word "for," and after the word "dollars," in line 10, insert the words "or so much thereof as shall be necessary," and that, when so amended, recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A. C. BRADFORD.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 649) for the relief of A. C. Bradford. This bill has been already reached on the Calendar this evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill referred to by the gentleman can only be recurred to by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay A. C. Bradford, late a judge of the thirteenth judicial district in the State of California, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $487.55, which sum was assessed as the income tax, and was collected from and paid by him to the Government of the United States, upon his salary as such district judge, for the years 1868 and 1869, such tax having been declared illegal and unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The sum stated in the bill is the amount of income tax assessed on the salary of claimant as district judge of the thirteenth judicial district for the State of California for the years 1869 and 1868, and paid by him. The tax was illegal and unconstitutional, hence the committee recommends the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I do not know that I shall object; but I would like to ask a question or two, reserving the right to object. I see this bill proposes to refund income tax on the ground that the tax was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. I wish the gentleman in charge of this bill would state whether the court so decided before this tax was assessed and collected, or whether this gentleman stands in the same category with thousands of other people who paid the income tax.

Mr. KERR. I believe the committee has adopted the rule of reporting in favor of repayment in all cases of this kind where a claim is filed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was this a judicial officer?

Mr. FELTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I am waiting for an answer to my inquiry. I must object, unless some one can answer the question.

Mr. FELTON. I can only state to the gentleman that this tax was declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be unconstitutional; and in cases of this kind which have come before the House, bills for refund of the tax have invariably been passed; I have never supposed that the Government of the United States desired to take the money of the citizen in an unlawful or unconstitutional manner. In this instance the claimant happens to be a poor man, and is in need of the money.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The gentleman has not answered my question. I am not asking whether the beneficiary in this case is a rich or a poor man, or anything of that kind. My question is whether this tax was declared illegal before it was collected and paid in this instance?

Mr. HOUK. I think this matter can be readily explained. As I understand, after the Supreme Court declared the income tax on salaries of State officers unconstitutional, a statute was passed by Congress providing for a refund of the tax; but there was a limitation of time within which claims must be filed. In this case, from some cause the man did not make his application within the prescribed time, and the object of this bill is simply to relieve the claimant from the bar created in that way.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If this man comes in that category, I have no objection.

SUFFERERS BY THE WRECK OF THE STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

Mr. COBB. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 869) heretofore called up by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY], who will move certain amendments to it to remove objections heretofore made.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to reimburse the survivors of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, wrecked at Vineyard Sound on the night of the 21st of August, 1884, for the losses incurred by them, respectively, in said wreck, there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, namely: To John F. Merry, lieutenant-commander; William H. Everett, lieutenant; Frank E. Beatty, lieutenant, junior grade; Nathan P. Towne, passed assistant engineer; W. B. Whittlesey, ensign; O. C. Tiffany, passed assistant paymaster, each $1,000. To Hugh Kuhl, mate; James W. Baxter, mate; L. B. Gallagher, mate; Leonard Hanscom, carpenter; James Bishop, junior, pay clerk; Thomas B. Kramer, apothecary, each $700. To Lieutenant W. H. Jaques, for loss of portion of naval uniform, including epaulettes, sword, sword-belt, sword-knot, and so forth, $150.

To all the survivors of the crew, namely: Joseph Arnold, first-class fireman; William A. Brooks, landsman; J. G. Baker, blacksmith; Charles E. Brown, steward to commander-in-chief; John W. Brown, jack-of-the-dust; Thomas Brooks, coal-heaver; William R. Burke, bayman; Moses G. Berry, second-class machinist; James E. Booth, coal-heaver; Moses H. Baker, wardroom steward; Smith Berry, landsman; Albert Beyer, ordinary seaman; John C. Conway, ship's corporal; William H. Christian, ordinary seaman; Charles G. Carlson, carpenter's mate; John Carter, ordinary seaman; Charles H. Coates, landsman; Timothy J. Campbell, coal-heaver; Thomas Condon, coal-heaver; George E. Dodge, landsman; John F. Dugan, quartermaster; William Dinning, first-class fireman; Clarence D. Dronenburg, coal-heaver; Peter Duffy, first-class fireman; Robert H. Dickinson, cabin steward; William E. Denmore, landsman; Joshua Davis, landsman; James D'Arcy, ordinary seaman; Edward Delph, ordinary seaman; James Dalhanty, second-class fireman; Patrick Eagan, first-class fireman; Dennis Faley, landsman; John Fowler, ship's yeoman; Charles F. Fugett, second-class fireman; Charles Har, ordinary seaman; David Harrington, first-class fireman; John Hughes, boatswain's mate; Thomas Hubert, ship's cook; Thomas Howell, first-class fireman; Alexander Hutton, first-class fireman; Daniel W. Hickman, cook to commander-in-chief; Benson Humphreys, coal-heaver; Andrew Hahn, chief quartermaster; Gustaf Huldt, seaman; John Jones, ship's writer; Jacob Jacobson, seaman; Richard H. Johnson, landsman; William E. Jones, landsman; William Johnson, ordinary seaman; James F. Kelley, landsman; William G. Kidd, lamp-lighter; John J. C. Koch, seaman; Patrick H. Kane, coal-heaver; John Kinnoe, ordinary seaman; George H. Lee, landsman; Fillmore Lewis, ordinary seaman; Daniel Lane, landsman; Andrew A. Lund, seaman; James Letford, coal-heaver; John J. Leonard, coal-heaver; Jacob W. Leer, pay yeoman; Thomas Murphy, captain of forecastle; John McDermott, captain of hold; Frank McMurray, first-class fireman; John W. Magee, second-class man; William Middleton, steerage-steward; Daniel McCarthy, coxswain; Patrick Morgan, captain of after-guard; James McCann, coal-heaver; Jacob Miller, landsman; Jules McLean, ordinary seaman; Felix Mackinsten, ordinary seaman; Michael O'Neil, second-class fireman; Timothy O'Reilly, first-class machinist; Peter Ostersen, chief gunner's mate; August Ohlinsen, master-at-arms; Patrick O'Brien, second-class fireman; Arthur O'Brien, coal-heaver; Joseph Padmore, ordinary seaman; Marshall Parker, landsman; John H. Palmer, cabin cook; James H. Richmond, painter; Horace Riley, ship's barber; William J. Redimaker, seaman; William E. Rockett, landsman; George C. Rees, ordinary seaman; Frank Sherman, ordinary seaman; Fred. Scharff, bugler; James O. Smallwood, first-class fireman; Amandas Straub, chief boatswain's mate; Edward Shanklin, coal-heaver; Alex. H. Sewell, quartermaster; Frank Small, seaman; Henry K. Steever, first-class machinist; Charles F. Scott, coxswain to commander-in-chief; Patrick Sweeney, captain of forecastle; Edward Small, landsman; J. D. Skidmore, landsman; Christian A. Simon, landsman; Frank Sullivan, landsman; Peter Thompson, coxswain; George Tinker, steerage cook; John Thompson, seaman; Herbert S. Trueman, captain of after-guard; Clarence D. Tippitt, second-class fireman; Daniel Tinsley, landsman; Jan C. Tinnman, ordinary seaman; James Taylor, seaman; William J. Turner, coal-heaver; Samuel W. Wells, engineer's yeoman; Isaac Williams, coal-heaver; Murray Williams, coal-heaver; Fred. Williams, landsman; Andrew White, wardroom cook; Charles Williams, ordinary seaman; Oscar Westerholm, seaman; Henry H. Walker, first-class machinist; each $100.

SEC. 3. That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle, upon principles of justice and equity, the accounts of the officers and crew on board the said vessel when wrecked, and to assume the last quarterly return of the paymaster of said vessel as the basis of computation of the subsequent credits to those on board to the date of such loss, if there be no evidence to the contrary.

Mr. McKINNEY. I move in line 13 to strike out "one thousand" and insert "five hundred;" so it will read:

Passed assistant paymaster, each $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKINNEY. I move to strike out the words "brothers and sisters" in the second section.

Mr. BYNUM. I wish also to strike out "parents" before the words "brothers and sisters."

Mr. COBB. The question first recurs on the motion to strike out "brothers and sisters."

Mr. BYNUM. I move as amendment to that to strike out "parents," and on my motion I demand a division.

Mr. McKINNEY. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I move to strike out the words in the second section, as follows:

Or in case there be not such, then the parent or parents, and if there be no parents the brothers and sisters.

So it will read:

SEC. 2. That the widow, child, or children of those in the service who were lost in the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKINNEY. I now move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

House bill 438 was reported to the House to be laid upon the table.

NEHEMIAH OSBURN.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 464) for the relief of Nehemiah Osburn.

The bill was read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the reading of the report in this case, and also to the reading of the bill. I would have been glad to have found some ground upon which this claim could go through. I will take one minute to state to the committee the reason why I shall insist upon my objection.

The contract in this case was drawn for the very purpose of preventing recourse to the courts as is now proposed. And while this claim may not be for a large amount of money, nevertheless it may establish a precedent which will lead to opening up cases arising out of the construction of gunboats and in reference to other matters during the war which may involve millions of dollars.

The President has vetoed during this very Congress a case of this character, and for reasons which are sound. The action proposed by this bill I believe to be one of doubtful expediency, and in view of the dangerous results to which it may lead I am compelled to insist upon my objection.

P. GOUGH EDELIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6753) for the relief of P. Gough Edelin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to P. Gough Edelin, of Maryland, the sum of $42.96, this amount having been advanced by him to Nicy Taliaferro upon revenue check numbered 109066, for $2,205.06, presented to him by her, payment of said check having since been refused at the United States subtreasury in Baltimore upon the ground that the said Taliaferro was erroneously pensioned under certificate 3024 (Navy).

The report (by Mr. SHAW) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6753) for the relief of P. Gough Edelin, report:

That they find a favorable report was made on this claim by the Committee on Claims during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. That report so fully sets forth the facts upon which the claim is based that your committee make it part hereof, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8698) for the relief of P. Gough Edelin, make the following report:

This is a claim for money advanced upon a draft issued by the proper officer upon the subtreasurer at New York, in payment of a claim of one Nicy Taliaferro for pension. After said draft was issued it was discovered that the said Taliaferro was erroneously pensioned, and payment of the same was refused upon presentation.

The utter inability of the recipient of this advance to make good the same renders it incumbent upon the Government to indemnify Mr. Edelin against all loss caused by its own error and mistake.

Wherefore your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WEAVER. A draft was sent to this party for $250 from the Pension Bureau. Whatever faults there are in this matter arose out of the laches of the Government officers, and it is only just this bill should pass to refund the amount to Mr. Edelin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. It is now nearly a quarter past 11 o'clock, and we have several bills to be acted upon in the House.

Mr. BYNUM. Let us go on a little while longer.

Mr. CARUTH. We can not rise now; I have a bill I want to pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is getting quite late, and it is very hard upon the reading clerks and the officers of the House generally. It is very oppressive. I am entirely impartial in the matter, but I think in justice to the officers of the House I should make a motion for the committee to rise.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will withhold that motion I will make it myself in a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

WILLIAM KNOWLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. KERR) was the bill (H. R. 2686) for the relief of William Knowland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to William Knowland, of New York City, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $193.17, being balance due for services as messenger to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice in the Forty-eighth Congress.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

That in the year 1884 claimant was employed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice from September 6, 1884, to October 22, 1884, during recess, at the rate of $125 per month, under resolution of January 21, 1884. That said claim was not paid, for the reason that there were not sufficient funds to the credit of said committee to pay him.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill pass for the payment of the claim.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

DAVID A. HAYWOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. BYNUM) was the bill (H. R. 3132) for the relief of David A. Haywood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to David A. Haywood, of Indianapolis, Ind., the sum of $350.32, for grading and bowlding Market street, in said city, in front o the post-office and court-house building, as per estimate made by the civil en gineer of the city of Indianapolis; and a sum sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LANHAM. I made the report in this case, and have investigated it thoroughly. I know it to be a meritorious case.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Appropriations have rejected similar bills for paving and grading around public buildings?

Mr. BYNUM. They can not include them in appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But every claim of that kind has been objected to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they have paid for paving constantly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I know what I am saying.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That the Government has not paid for paving around the public buildings.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I mean precisely that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I know that I have collected from Congress for paving around the public buildings in St. Louis.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then you have been unusually lucky.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

J. R. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia) was the bill (H. R. 4201) for the relief of J. R. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. R. Jones, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of eighty-four dollars and fifty-one cents.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES CALER.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. BOWDEN) was the bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief of James Caler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officer of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to James Caler, of Stamford, Conn., the sum of $8,445, for work done by him under a contract with the United States in the dredging and excavation of the bar at Rutherford Park, in the Passaic River, New Jersey.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is involved in this claim?

Mr. BOWDEN. Eight thousand four hundred and forty-five dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. There should be some statement, or else the report should be read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. BOWDEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief of James Caler, submit the following report:

That the committee, finding the bill favorably reported by the House committee at the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, adopt the same, as follows:

"That on the 25th day of June, 1873, the petitioner entered into a contract with the United States of America for dredging and excavating the bar at Rutherford Park, in the Passaic River, New Jersey. For this work he was to receive, when it was completed, the sum of $14,500. The work has been completed according to the requirements of the contract. In the specifications, which were made part of the contract, the material was represented as consisting 'of loose stones, bowlders, sand, and gravel.' After quite a large part of the work had been done it was discovered that the remaining portion of the material to be removed consisted in part of a hard blue clay and hardpan, the removal of which was attended with an expense much greater than would have attended the removal of such material as the contract specified. For this extra expense Mr. Caler claims compensation.

"Lieut. Col. John Newton, who was engineer in charge of the work, and who represented the United States in making said contract, and executed it for them, admits that there was a mistake made in the description in the contract of the character of the material to be removed, and that the claimant is entitled to some relief; and your committee are of that opinion. The question as to the amount that should be allowed him in full compensation is one of some difficulty.

"In a communication addressed to your committee, dated May 1, 1878, he says: 'In arriving at a conclusion as to the extent of Mr. Caler's claim against the Government, there must be some uncertainty in spite of all the care that can be taken. As to the fact that he has some claim there can be no dispute, because the materials—sand, gravel, broken stone, and bowlders—which he contracted to remove were underlaid in some parts by a hard clay very difficult to dredge, and which was not specified in the contract.'

"Colonel Newton has made, at the request of your committee, two computations of the amount to be paid to the claimant in full satisfaction. The first is upon a basis of a payment for the use of his dredge and scows used, and of the wages of the men required to handle them, with the other expenses incident to their use. Upon this basis he finds the amount to be paid to the claimant to be $11,709. Subsequently Colonel Newton submitted another estimate based upon payment to the claimant for the ordinary wear and repair of machinery, wages of the men employed, with interest upon the value of the dredge, scows, and other material used in the prosecution of the work, to which he adds $1,000 for the services of the claimant. Upon this basis he makes the amount to be paid $7,245.

"This computation leaves out all compensation for the use of property of the claimant in the prosecution of this work for a period of sixteen months, which is valued at the sum of $16,500, and for $18,471 advanced and paid out by him in the prosecution of the work (in all, the sum of $34,971), excepting 6 per cent. interest on his said disbursements and on the sum at which the property used was valued. This, your committee think, is not just, because it is apparent that 6 per cent. interest upon the value of such property is not sufficient compensation for its use. The property is used up and destroyed by its use; and this compensation makes no allowance for the rapid depreciation and final loss of the property.

It is well understood that vessels of this kind become of little or no value for use after a period of twelve or fifteen years, and if the owner receives but 6 per cent. interest on his investment for fifteen years and then suffers a loss of the sum invested, his investment can not be considered a profitable one. It is also manifest that no man can afford to invest $16,500 in dredges and scows and run them upon a work of this character for sixteen months at an expense to himself of $18,471 and receive as compensation only the sum of $1,000 for his services, with interest at 6 per cent. on his capital invested and money advanced, with payment of his cash advancements.

Your committee are of opinion that there should be added to this last estimate of Colonel Newton the sum of $1,200 as a further compensation for the claimant's services, use of his property, and interest upon his disbursements, making in all the sum of $8,445, to be paid to him in full satisfaction of his claim, and they therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHESAPEAKE BANK, BALTIMORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. HOUK) was the bill (H. R. 4531) for the relief of the Chesapeake Bank of Baltimore, Md.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. FINLEY. Before that I would like to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CARUTH. I hope the committee will not rise. I ask the consideration of a bill which is the next on the Calendar. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is on the motion that the committee now rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 14.

Before the announcement of the vote,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, said: I will withdraw my vote in the affirmative, and vote in the negative so as to give the gentleman from Kentucky a chance to get his bill in.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HOUK. I now demand the regular order—the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The bill was read at length.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report should be read.

Mr. LANHAM. It will take a long time to read the report and the officers of the House have a great deal of work to do after the House adjourns. Much work has been done in committee, and it is now near 12 o'clock; so I move that the committee rise.

Mr. CARUTH. We have not had any intervening business.

The CHAIRMAN. A bill has been called up.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 9.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain a request now. The committee determines to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is quite late, and I suggest that by unanimous consent the previous question be ordered upon the final passage of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that that can not be done, as they are separate measures.

Mr. HOLMAN. The previous question can be ordered upon the final passage of each bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will take but a very short time to dispose of the bills separately.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, were severally ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin;
A bill (H. R. 5853) for the relief of Daniel Bond;
A bill (H. R. 4765) for the relief of G. W. McAdam;
A bill (H. R. 2696) for the relief of John J. Crooke;
A bill (H. R. 5336) for the relief of George B. Hansell;
A bill (H. R. 649) for the relief of A. C. Bradford;
A bill (H. R. 6753) for the relief of P. Gough Edelin;
A bill (H. R. 2686) for the relief of William Knowland;
A bill (H. R. 3132) for the relief of David A. Haywood; and
A bill (H. R. 4201) for the relief of J. R. Jones.

ZEB WARD.

The bill (S. 321) for the relief of Zeb Ward, reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill H. R. 68, of the same title, was laid on the table.

A. B. NORTON.

The bill H. R. 4805, reported from the Committee of the Whole, was laid on the table.

JOHN T. ROBESON.

The bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson was reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment. The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John T. Robeson."

SUFFERERS BY THE WRECK OF THE TALLAPOOSA.

The bill (S. 869) for the relief of sufferers by the wreck of United States steamer Tallapoosa was reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments. The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill H. R. 438, for the same purpose, was laid on the table.

Mr. COBB (pending the passage of the Senate bill). I objected to the consideration of this bill, but withdrew my objection because I was willing that the bill should be considered upon the statements that were made and with the amendment suggested. I have not, however, changed my view as to the principle involved.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the votes by which the bills were severally passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES CALER.

The bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief James Caler, reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that it do pass, was read by its title.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the reading of an engrossed copy of that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the engrossed bill is not here. The bill must therefore go over unless the House determines to remain in session until an engrossed copy can be obtained.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOCKERY. I rise to make a request for unanimous consent. The chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. LANHAM] has had no opportunity this evening to have a bill considered, and, on account of his faithful and efficient service, I ask that he be allowed the privilege of calling up one bill.

Mr. SAYERS. And I, too.

Mr. CARUTH. And I, too.

Several other members demanded the same privilege.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] was made without my knowledge or solicitation, and I appreciate it very highly, but——

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the request.

ROBERT F. ARNOLD.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8270) for the relief of Robert F. Arnold, and that the House proceed to consider the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Robert F. Arnold the sum of $1,000, for services rendered in behalf of the United States in the district court at Graham, Tex., and for this purpose the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the facts will be stated briefly.

Mr. LANHAM. This gentleman assisted the district attorney of the United States court at Graham in the prosecution of some alleged train-robbers. The report is somewhat lengthy, and I will only read what the district judge says in regard to this claim:

I cordially and earnestly approve this account. The case was one in which any district attorney would need assistance. Mr. Arnold ably assisted. By any standard known to good lawyers $1,000 is a reasonable fee for the service performed.

A. P. McCORMICK,
United States District Judge.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

M. V. B. SUTTON.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5144) for the relief of M. V. B. Sutton, late postmaster at Williamsburgh, Ky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the claim of M. V. B. Sutton, late postmaster at Williamsburgh, Ky., for $209.88, money and stamps lost by him on account of the robbery of his safe, February 12, 1884.

There being no objection the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment, reported by the Committee on Claims, was read, as follows:

After the word "pay," in line 4, insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BYNUM. I would like to know whether the Post-Office Department does not adjust claims of this kind?

Mr. FINLEY. This matter comes here by the authority of the Post-Office Department, as the report shows. The Department sent out a special agent to investigate the case.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FINLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. SAMPSON AND BENJAMIN HENRICKS.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4789) for the relief of George W. Sampson and Benjamin Henricks, of Austin, Tex.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasurer be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay $1,500 to George W. Sampson and Benjamin Henricks, of Austin, Tex., as compensation for the use of a court-room and offices for the marshal and clerk of the United States district court of the western district of Texas, from the 1st day of July, 1865, to the 1st day of July, 1866.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

In line 5, strike out "one thousand five hundred" before the word "dollars," and insert "one thousand."

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire under what circumstances this property was rented.

Mr. SAYERS. It was rented for the purpose of holding United States courts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rented by whom?

Mr. SAYERS. By the proper authorities.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was there not an express agreement that if the bill establishing courts there should be passed, the court-house would be furnished without expense to the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. I never heard of any such agreement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to amend by inserting before the words "George W. Samson and Benjamin Henricks," the words "the heirs of," as both these parties are dead.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the title of the bill be amended by inserting after the words "relief of" the words "the heirs of," so as to correspond with the amendment made in the body of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

CAROLINE T. COCKLE.

Mr. POST. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 736) for the relief of Caroline T. Cockle.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $199.80 be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse Caroline T. Cockle, executrix of Washington Cockle, late postmaster at Peoria, Ill., for money expended for lighting the Peoria post-office during the fiscal year 1884.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POST moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHAMBERS & BROWN.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 329) for the relief of Chambers & Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Chambers & Brown $270, being the amount overpaid by them for special licenses in the year 1874.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, the words "Chambers & Brown," and insert:

"Henry Chambers and George E. Brown, partners, trading and doing business under the name, firm, and style of Chambers & Brown, on the 14th day of August, 1874, at 299 West Main street, Louisville, Ky."

Mr. CARUTH. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "E." in the name "George E. Brown" and inserting "G." The correct name is "George G. Brown."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARUTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

S. T. MARSHALL.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2196) for the relief of S. T. Marshall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay S. T. Marshall, of Keokuk, Iowa, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full of all claim or demand of said S. T. Marshall, assignee of G. M. Marshall, in a contract made in 1850, to supply and furnish beef cattle to General Estill, purchasing and disbursing agent of the United States for the commission sent to California in 1850 to make treaties with the Indians, the sum of $6,598.49, with interest thereon at 6 per cent., but such allowance and payment to be subject to any and all credits to be shown or ascertained upon a fair and equitable settlement and adjustment of his accounts (as such assignee of said G. M. Marshall) with the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

In line 13, after the word "cents," strike out "with interest thereon at 6 per cent."

Mr. HOLMAN. The report should be read.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2196) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, report that in 1850 one G. M. Marshall took to California for the use of the Government 150 ranch cattle and 75 large American beeves, which were delivered to Redick McKee, United States Indian agent, for which the said agent gave a certificate, of which the following is a copy:

"SAN FRANCISCO, December 31, 1851.

"This is to certify that in the adjustment of the account of James M. Estel for beef cattle purchased in my late expedition through the Indian country, on the Klamath, there is due to G. M. Marshall, as per within order of said Estel, dated 15th instant, the sum of $6,598.49.

"At this time I have not funds in my hands applicable to this claim, but have confidence that Congress, during its present session, will provide the means for its payment at an early date, and, in my opinion, it should be paid out of the first moneys appropriated for such purposes in California.

"REDICK McKEE,
"United States Indian Agent."

This certificate was in 1876, by the following instrument, assigned to this claimant:

"STATE OF IOWA, Lee County:

"For value received, I, G. M. Marshall, hereby sell, assign, and set over to S. T. Marshall the above certificate or paper signed by Redick McKee, Indian agent, and he is authorized to collect, settle, and receipt for whatever may be obtained on the same in as full faith and authority as I could do in my own proper person, having sold and transferred said paper or evidence of indebtedness to said S. T. Marshall in the A. D. 1856, and the original having been lost or placed in the hands of persons for collection and can not be found, the foregoing be a true copy of the original.

"G. M. MARSHALL."

"Done and subscribed in my presence this 3d day of January, A. D. 1876.
"[SEAL.] R. M. MARSHALL, Notary Public.

The full history of the claim was contained in a sworn statement of Redick McKee, disbursing agent of the Government; and in the debate in the House, in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, from which we quote as follows:

"DISBURSING AGENT'S STATEMENT.

"1334 G STREET, Washington, January 15, 1876.

"SIR: I have examined the papers you handed me touching the claim of G. M. Marshall, assigned to his brother, S. T. Marshall, of Keokuk, Iowa, and return the same herewith.

"My recollection of the transaction is distinct; and I think the copy of the certificate sent is an exact copy of the original issued to Marshall December 31, 1851, calling for $6,598.49. As the purchasing and disbursing agent of the commission sent to California in 1850 to make treaties with the hostile and discontented Indians of that State, I made a contract with General Estill, owner of the Sascol Ranch, to send with my expedition to the Klamath and Trinity River country a drove of cattle, to supply my own party—the accompanying escort, of United States troops—and for presents to the Indians.

"In pursuance of this contract General Estill did send some 100 or 150 ranch cattle and 70 or 75 large American beeves under the direction and charge of G. M. Marshall, as agent; I understood at the time that the same cattle belonged to Marshall, and that he was in some way interested in the contract. We started from Benicia, via Sonoma Valley and Russian River, I think, early in August, and I got back to San Francisco in the last days of December. Estill and Marshall settled their accounts, and the former drew an order on me in favor of the latter for the amount stated in the certificate, $6,598.49.

"Of the first appropriation made for the service in California ($25,000) I had to expend nearly half of it in the purchase of Indian goods in New York, under an assurance from the Department that at the next session of Congress $100,00 more would be estimated for, and no doubt sent me by mail at San Francisco Relying on this we commenced operation, and were happily successful in restoring peace in the central part of our field. During the session of 1850-'51 however, Commissioner Lea wrote me that the House Committee on Appropriations had cut down this estimate for the service in California from $100,000 to $75,000, and I must be governed accordingly. I obeyed instructions, made no contracts or engagements which I thought would exceed that sum, and none not absolutely necessary for the peace of the country.

"You can judge of our disappointment, especially my own, on finding that after all Congress appropriated for the service in the whole State but $42,500, and of this the Department sent me but $27,500! Of course I was unable to pay Marshall and other contractors, and had to resort to the issuance of certificates of indebtedness. By request of the Department I reported in February, and again in July, 1852, on remaining indebtedness in California, in both of which reports this claim of Marshall's is included. (Vide Senate Ex. Doc. No. 4, special session, 1853, pages 285 and 343.)

"Mr. Marshall being anxious to return home, I gave him a letter to the Commissioner to the effect that if the appropriation had not been remitted to me he might be paid here. And hearing nothing further from either the claimant or the Department, I took it for granted his claim had been settled. On inquiry at the Department I now find it has never been paid; and as I know it to be a just claim I hope Congress will pay it without any longer delay. If Congress shall treat Mr. Marshall as Col. J. C. Frémont was treated in the settlement of his cattle accounts (10 Stat. L., 804), the interest will give the poor man some amends for being kept out of his money for twenty-four years.

"If this statement should fail to satisfy the committee, or if it should be necessary that I verify it by a formal affidavit, let me know.

"In haste, but very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

"REDICK McKEE,
"Late Disbursing Agent in California.

"P. S.—If any question should be raised as to my status as commissioner, disbursing agent, etc., reference may be made to the Document No. 4, published by order of the Senate in 1853, above referred to. On page 8 you will see I was expressly instructed to pay the salaries of my colleagues, 'and all other expenses of the commission.'

"R. McKEE."

"Subscribed and sworn on this the 26th of January, 1876, before me.

"JOHN BAILEY,
"Justice of the Peace within and for the District of Columbia."

RELIEF OF S. T. MARSHALL.

"The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2695) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, of Lee County, Iowa.

"The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to S. T. Marshall, of Lee County, Iowa, whatever sum may be found to be due him on account of beef cattle furnished the United States for the use of the Indian Department in California in 1851, upon a fair and equitable settlement of his accounts (as assignee of G. M. Marshall) with the Secretary of the Interior.

"1877. Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

"The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs accompanying the bill was read, as follows:

"'As the purchasing and disbursing agent of the commission which was sent to California in 1850 to make treaties with the hostile Indians in California, Redick McKee made a contract with General Estill to furnish beef cattle for the escort of United States soldiers which accompanied said McKee and party; that said Estill did furnish a large number of cattle under the contract in which the claimant seems to have been interested.'"

"In December, 1850, at San Francisco, the accounts of Estill and Marshall were settled, and the agent, McKee, gave to them a certificate of indebtedness, showing that there was due them on the beef contract the sum of $6,598.49, which said McKee said, and still says, he had not the money to pay, in consequence of the appropriation for the service in California having been reduced much below what he supposed it would be. As evidence of said indebtedness, however, said McKee gave to G. M. Marshall a certificate of indebtedness.

"A copy as sworn to by said McKee is herewith submitted, together with the other evidence in the case. And, confirmatory of this, said McKee in his official report to the Committee on Indian Affairs states that this amount is due to said Marshall, but qualified by an indorsement in these words: 'Subject to credit.' But your committee have not been able to ascertain the amount of the 'credit' to which said claim is 'subject,' nor on what account. Your committee are satisfied, however, that a part at least of this claim is just and ought to be paid.

"It may be, and your committee believe it is, true that the contract made by said McKee with Estill and Marshall to furnish beef to the expedition was made without authority of law; but the evidence shows very clearly that said McKee was the accredited agent of the Government, and that these parties contracted with him under the belief that he had authority to contract with them for and on behalf of the Government, and that he himself believed he had authority to make the contract with them; and also that these parties, in good faith, furnished the beef cattle for the use of the Government, and that the Government got the benefit of them. It seems but just and equitable, therefore, that these parties should be paid a fair compensation for their property so furnished the Government. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, as a substitute for House bill No. 118 referred to them."

"The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the portion of the report showing the date of the transaction.

"The Clerk read as follows:

"'As the purchasing and disbursing agent of the commission which was sent to California in 1850 to make treaties with the hostile Indians in California, Redick McKee made a contract with General Estill to furnish beef cattle for the escort of United States soldiers which accompanied said McKee and party; that said Estill did furnish a large number of cattle under the contract, in which the claimant seems to have been interested."

"Mr. MCCRARY. The only objection that I understand the gentleman from Indiana to raise to the payment of this claim is that it has been due a long time, if due at all. Being familiar with the evidence in the case, I desire to state to the gentleman and to the House that this delay is fully explained by the evidence. The claim was made very soon after it accrued. The papers were placed in the hands of parties here in the city of Washington for the prosecution of the claim. They were held by those parties for some time without the money being collected, the action of Congress being required. When the war broke out the persons who had possession of the papers and charge of the claim went into the Southern army. The claimant has never been able to find them since, and his efforts to find those parties and the original papers have delayed him until within the last year or two, when he has procured duplicates from the original Indian agent himself, which are sworn to and filed in the evidence in this case.

"There is some little doubt as to the exact amount which is due to this claimant, as stated in the report. But that he furnished property to the United States for which he has never received a cent is entirely clear; and a fair settlement of his accounts at the Treasury Department will determine exactly what is due him. I hope, therefore, that the bill will not be passed over, but will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

"Mr. BOONE. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that this bill did undergo a very close examination by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is true the report does not set forth all the evidence in support of the claim, and it is further true that this claim is an old one. But that is very easily accounted for. Now, there can be no possible doubt about this case. These parties furnished the Government with beef, which was consumed, and the Government got the benefit of it. It was furnished at the instance of an officer of the Government, Mr. McKee, who was the agent of the Government in California to treat with hostile Indians, and the reason he had not money to meet this debt arose from a misapprehension on his part as to what would be the appropriation."

It appearing from the above that the bill for the allowance of the claim was reported favorably in the Forty-fourth Congress, and your committee, being satisfied that the claim is just and ought to be paid, recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out the allowance of interest in the thirteenth line of the bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Speaker, I will not insist on reading the entire report. This bill was reported to the Forty-fourth Congress, and, while I do not remember the exact character of the measure, I can see the time consumed would postpone the bill.

Mr. GEAR. The goods were furnished and met with the approval of the officer in charge of the expedition, but Congress failed to make the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why did it not pass the Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress?

Mr. GEAR. It failed for want of time.

Mr. COBB. Why has there been so much delay in the payment of this claim?

Mr. GEAR. It has been pending for years.

Mr. COBB. How does it come the assignee becomes possessed of the claim?

Mr. GEAR. The man who furnished the goods died.

Mr. COBB. What was the consideration of the transfer?

Mr. GEAR. The goods were furnished to the Government.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up for consideration.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, moved that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 14.

So the motion was disagreed to.

C. L. WILSON.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move, by unanimous consent, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7232) for the relief of C. L. Wilson and it be taken up for present consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of C. L. Wilson, postmaster at Milford Ellis County, Texas, with the sum of $50, for money lost in transit.

The report of the committee (by Mr. LANHAM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill No. 7232, for the relief of C. L. Wilson, find that said C. L. Wilson was postmaster at Milford, Ellis County, Texas, on the 27th day of April, A. D. 1886; that on said day he placed two ten-dollar bills and one fifty-dollar bill, with a letter of remittance, in a penalty envelope which was sealed and directed to the postmaster at Galveston, Tex., and was then placed in an official registered package, which was also sealed and directed to the postmaster at Galveston, Tex. This registered package was then placed in the box containing the balance of the mail for the day.

Mr. W. H. Hudson, a reputable citizen of Ellis County, Texas, was present and saw the money counted and placed in envelopes and directed as aforesaid. He also signed the letter of remittance as a witness.

Mr. Wilson swears that the said registered package was the same day placed in a locked pouch and delivered to the mail carrier. When the same reached Galveston the letter contained the two $10 bills, but the $50 bill had been extracted while in transit.

As soon as the loss was made known to him he made claim therefor under the act of March 17, 1882; but his claim was not allowed, for the reason that every step required by the regulations for remitting post-office funds had not been complied with, in this, that the witness, Mr. Hudson, did not see the registered packnge placed in the mail pouch and delivered to the mail carrier.

The committee are of opinion that the omission on the part of Mr. Wilson to comply with the regulations in making said remittance was due to his want of information of the requirements of the postal regulations at the time the same was remitted. It has been shown that Mr. Wilson is a man of good character and standing in his community, and it is believed by the committee that the loss of said money is not chargeable to any intentional neglect of duty of Mr. Wilson.

Wherefore your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ABBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOWDEN. I hope not until I can get through one more case.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 9.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock midnight) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. CANDLER: A bill (H. R. 10834) to correct the military record of Benny Atkins—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. S. T. HOPKINS: Of 18 farmers of Ulster County, New York.

The following petition for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. BLOUNT: Of Mallory & Taylor, L. W. Hunt, and others, citizens of Georgia.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 16, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. FRANCIS T. INGALLS, D. D., President of Drury College, Springfield, Mo.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting correspondence on file in the Treasury Department in relation to traffic over the Detroit bridge, concerning duties; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of the cost for the repairs of the Kennebec arsenal at Augusta, Me.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the letter of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting a list of appointments to the Post-Office, and the letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 30, 1888, a list of the employés below the classified service since March, 1885, now on the table, be referred to the Select Committee to Examine into the Condition of the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented two petitions of citizens of Duval, Fla., and a petition of citizens of Greene, Miss., praying for the passage of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the adoption of police regulations for the suppression of the adulteration of food, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of John O. Leary and 93 others, citizens of Cambridge, Mass., praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of Hennepin County, Minnesota, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of citizens of Laclede County, Missouri, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of 33 citizens of Taylor County, Iowa, praying for the passage of additional amendments to the interstate-commerce act, prohibiting any railroad company from transporting merchandise in cars belonging to any shipper for such shippers; also in regard to fines and their disposition; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of oyster packers of Baltimore, Md.; a petition of dealers in canned goods and others, of Cleveland, Ohio; a petition of salmon packers and others, of Portland, Oregon; a petition of the St. Paul (Minn.) Chamber of Commerce; and a petition of canners and packers of Baltimore, Md., praying for the repayment in full of duties paid on imported tin when made into cans and exported containing American products; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., remonstrating against the allowance of drawback on articles made from imported materials and exported to foreign markets after being manufactured here; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of 52 citizens of Highland County, Ohio, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented the petition of David McDonald and 15 other druggists of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax upon druggists as liquor sellers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK presented a petition of citizens of Hopkins County, Kentucky, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I present a memorial of leading merchants of Baltimore, Md., engaged in trade between that port and Brazil, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate, or any similar bill, granting subsidies to steam-ship lines between this country and Brazil, believing the same to be unjust, as tending to build up one interest at the expense of others. As the matter is now in conference between the two Houses I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Macon, Ga., praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law that classes druggists as liquor dealers, and also for reducing the tax on alcohol used in medicine and the arts; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9894) granting a pension to Myron Teachout;

A bill (H. R. 10579) to place the name of Samuel Massey on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 2140) granting a pension to Eliza Smith;

A bill (H. R. 9878) granting a pension to Moses T. Coffey;

A bill (H. R. 9034) granting a pension to Lydia A. Heiny; and

A bill (H. R. 3923) to place the name of Frederic Ronicke on the pension-roll.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical Church, of Martinsburgh, W. Va., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3125) restoring the right of pre-emption to Alfonso Roberts, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3305) setting apart a tract of land to be used as a cemetery by the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Central City, Colo., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2484) for the relief of John Murphy and the Spalding Lumber Company, submitted a report thereon, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 878) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Niles, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Grace, praying reimbursement of expenses incurred by him in consequence of injuries received while in the discharge of his duties as a laborer at the Capitol, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 3328) for the relief of James Grace; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2019) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report favorably to the prayer of the petition of the Department of Ohio, Grand Army of the Republic, praying that an appropriation be made for the purchase of head-stones for deceased soldiers' graves. I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2068) for the relief of Jacob Kern, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8075) granting a pension to Anna M. Arnold, widow of John Arnold;

A bill (H. R. 7302) granting a pension to William C. Lord; and

A bill (H. R. 5490) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine Sinnott.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 100) for the relief of Samuel Tate, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1668) for the relief of A. M. Woodruff, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2187) to authorize the retirement of Lieut. John A. Payne, with the rank of major, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION STATEMENTS.

Mr. VANCE. I am authorized by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], July 11, 1888, in relation to statements on the sundry civil appropriation bill, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, the Committee on Appropriations be authorized to employ a stenographer to take down such statements in regard to items therein as the committee may desire to have reported; and the committee may have such statements printed for its use.

PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. GIBSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3376) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans, to report it favorably without amendment. The bill has already passed the House, and I ask that it be put on its passage at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been this morning reported, the Senator from Louisiana asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the same. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

Mr. GIBSON. I will state that the bill has been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it has passed the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans, La., shall be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include that portion of the parish of Jefferson lying between the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain, the upper line of the parish of Orleans, left bank, and a line running parallel thereto, commencing at the Mississippi River at a point 2 miles above the upper line of the said parish of Orleans and extending to Lake Pontchartrain.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HAWLEY. By instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I report favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 195) electing managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to fill vacancies caused by the expiration of the terms of office of members of the present board of managers on the 21st day of April, 1888, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Col. Leonard A. Harris, of the State of Ohio, General John A. Martin, of the State of Kansas, and General John F. Hartranft, of the State of Pennsylvania be, and they are hereby, elected managers of "The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," to fill vacancies caused by expiration of the terms of office of members of the present board of managers on the 21st day of April, A. D., 1888.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DANIEL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia. If there be no objection, I should be very glad if the bill could be put upon its passage at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks that the Senate now proceed to consider the bill this morning reported. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment of the committee will be stated.

Mr. VEST. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia, as I am not sufficiently acquainted with the localities here to locate those squares, where it is proposed that the depots shall be constructed under the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. The bill defines the localities.

Mr. VEST. But in what part of the city? Does this road come up to the vicinity of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir. It is not on Pennsylvania avenue, and it is not on any of the reservations. It has nothing to do with the question, as I understand it, of railroad locations on the reservations. They simply wish to connect some properties that they already own by crossing certain streets, so as to perfect their track. It has nothing to do with the question of buildings or reservations, which we have had up several times.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first inquire if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill, except upon the ground that it seems to me from the location defined in the bill, if we propose now to grant the occupancy of certain land, it is likely to interfere with the general plan we had before the Senate about two weeks ago. I think the various propositions ought to be considered together, and each railroad ought to have some location set aside for it, so that one will not interfere with the other.

I suppose the Richmond and Danville road coming in from the South certainly wants to unite with both the railroads running north and east, the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio, and I should think that the location of the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania line, if new locations are to be given them, ought to be considered jointly with this bill, in order that all interests may be best subserved. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Virginia to let the bill go over.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not think the bill has any relation to the proposition or plans provided for other railroads. The blocks 269 and 300 and across Thirteen and a half street near E are in the lower corner of the city, and it does not interfere with the avenue or with the reservation or with any of the plans of the other railroads.

The Richmond and Danville Company have property down there that they have already bought, and they want to run their track across a few streets in order to perfect their line.

Mr. McPHERSON. The bill proposes, I believe, that the company shall occupy a part of Delaware avenue?

Mr. DANIEL. Maryland avenue.

Mr. McPHERSON. Running down to the Long Bridge?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Part of Maryland avenue is already occupied by the Pennsylvania line; the Baltimore and Ohio have also asked permission to occupy a portion of Maryland avenue, and it is proposed that this road shall take possession of that particular location.

Mr. DANIEL. This is some distance from the proposed location.

Mr. VEST. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection, taking its place on the Calendar.

NEWBURGH CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Printing instruct me to report favorably the joint resolution (S. R. 97) for the printing of the report of the Newburgh, N. Y., centennial celebration. They report a substitute, making it a concurrent resolution in accordance with the statute, and I ask action thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Joint Select Committee of Congress on the Newburgh, N. Y., monument and centennial celebration of 1883, submitted on the 26th of June, 1886, be printed, and that 4,500 copies be printed and bound in cloth, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House, and 1,500 for the use of the Joint Select Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say that the amendment not only changes the form to a concurrent resolution, but considerably reduces the number proposed to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. MONUMENT TO GEORGE ROGERS CLARK.

Mr. HOAR. I report from the Committee on the Library the bill (S. 2967) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of General George Rogers Clark. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement in regard to the bill, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. It is unnecessary, I suppose, to state for the information of any member of this body the brilliant service to this country of the gallant soldier and son of Virginia in whose memory this public honor is proposed. It is enough to say that by one of the most daring and gallant exploits in our military history, where General Clark not only risked his life to capture a superior British force intrenched in a strong fortification, but also took the responsibility of raising upon the country the supplies needed for his expedition, our boundary as against the British possessions in this country was made the lakes instead of the Ohio River.

There is to be this week in Ohio a celebration of the inauguration of civil government in the Northwestern Territory, and at that celebration suitable honor will be paid by the distinguished orators who will take part in it to the memory of this great warrior. It seems fitting that the celebration of this important centennial should be accompanied by this mark of honor to the memory of Clark by the Congress of the United States.

I therefore report back the bill with amendments, and ask unanimous consent that it be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of General George Rogers Clark. In recognition of the eminent services to his country of General George Rogers Clark, in the occupation and conquest of the Northwestern Territory during the Revolutionary war, it proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the purpose of erecting in the city of Washington a monument to his memory, to be expended under the direction and control of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in line 9, the word "Washington" and inserting the words "Louisville, in the State of Kentucky."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the bill in the eleventh line by striking out all after the word "suitable" in the bill and inserting the words "site in said city, said site and the title thereto to be approved by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the passage of this bill I desire to place upon record, as reasons for its passage, a brief account of the great achievements performed by George Rogers Clark, written by Judge Burnet, of Cincinnati, in his famous notes on the Northwestern Territory, in which he describes his visit to George Rogers Clark, then living in Louisville, Ky. He says:

"At that time the exploits of General Clark, whose military talents were of a high order, were fresh in the recollection of the country. Early in the Revolutionary war, while a private citizen, holding no commission, civil or military, he distinguished himself by his efforts to protect the frontier settlements of Virginia and North Carolina against the incursions of the Indians.

"He led the party which made the first lodgment at the Falls of the Ohio, where an improvement was then commenced, from which the splendid city of Louisville has grown up. He was the leading commissioner in negotiating a treaty between the United States and the chiefs and warriors of the Shawnee Nation, including a part of the Delawares, at the mouth of the Big Miami, in January, 1786, by which the United States were acknowledged to be the sole and absolute sovereigns of all the territory ceded by the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783.

"His expedition to the Mississippi in 1778 was then a part of the unwritten history of the Revolution, but it was universally known and justly appreciated in the West, and it gave him a high rank among the military men of his day. When the Commonwealth of Virginia sent him a colonel's commission, accompanied with a warrant to raise a regiment of volunteers, and for that purpose to make contracts on the credit of the State, they did not furnish him with funds for the purpose, but left him to procure them in the best way he could, either on their credit or on his own. Yet such was his perseverance and so unbounded was his confidence in the honor of his native State, and such was his influence with the people of the West, who knew his bravery and his military talents, that he soon raised a regiment of hardy Kentuckians, whom he inspired with his own spirit, and, having attached them warmly to his person, led them to the Mississippi, and captured the post at Kaskaskias and Cahokia.

"The inhabitants of those villages, on receiving a promise of protection, declared allegiance to the United States. At that time Governor Hamilton was at Fort Vincennes, making his arrangements to capture Clark and his band of heroes, which he expected to accomplish with but little difficulty. Clark, however, was aware of the governor's purposes and also of the danger of his own situation, and determined to anticipate his enemy. Having left a sufficient number of men to insure the safety of the conquest he had already made, he proceeded with the residue by a forced march through swamps and quagmires to the Wabash, where he arrived without the loss of a man, though the country was so flooded that they sometimes were compelled to swim.

"The advance of the troops was so arranged as to bring them to the village before the dawn of day and before the governor was advised of their movement from the Mississippi. The consequence was that the post was carried by storm, and the governor and his troops made prisoners of war.

"That expedition was not excelled in difficulty and suffering or in daring courage by the memorable march of Arnold to Quebec in 1775."

This is the important paragraph that I wish to place upon record as the testimony of Judge Burnet, himself one of the most distinguished men of the Northwest Territory, and an eminent lawyer and for many years judge of the supreme court of Ohio.

"General Clark succeeded in retaining military possession of that extensive country till the close of the war, and by that means secured it to the United States. The fact is well known that in arranging the articles of the treaty of peace at Paris the British commissioners insisted on the Ohio River as part of the northern boundary of the United States, and that the Count de Vergennes favored that claim. It appears also from the diplomatic correspondence on that subject that the only tenable ground on which the American commissioners relied to sustain their claim to the lakes as the boundary was the fact that General Clark had conquered the country and was in the undisputed military possession of it at the time of the negotiation. That fact was affirmed and admitted, and was the chief ground on which the British commissioners reluctantly abandoned their claim."

Again he says: "It is a fact of importance in estimating the character and claims of General Clark on the American people that the Legislature of Virginia did not furnish him with money or other means to accomplish the service they had appointed him to perform. They merely sent him a commission, accompanied with power to recruit men and make contracts obligatory on the State. But the State having no credit he was cast on his own energy, and relied on his own personal efforts to raise and equip his troops, and to feed and clothe them during the time of their service, which continued to the end of the war. The task he undertook was a herculean one. There were but very few who could have accomplished it; and nothing but the most ardent attachment to his country could have prompted him to undertake it and to persevere as he did."

* * * * * *

"A person familiar with the lives and character of the military veterans of Rome, in the days of her greatest power, might readily have selected this remarkable man as a specimen of the model he had formed of them in his own mind; but he was rapidly falling a victim to his extreme sensibility, and to the ingratitude of his native State, under whose banner he had fought bravely and with great success.

"The time will certainly come when the enlightened and magnanimous citizens of Louisville will remember the debt of gratitude they owe the memory of that distinguished man.

"He was the leader of the pioneers who made the first lodgment on the site now covered by their rich and splendid city. He was its protector during the years of its infancy and in the period of its greatest danger. Yet the traveler who has read of his achievements, admired his character, and visited the theater of his brilliant deeds discovers nothing indicating the place where his remains are deposited, and where he can go and pay a tribute of respect to the memory of the departed and gallant hero."

This typical hero and founder of five great States was as distinguished in the neglect and injustice done him by his countrymen as in the brilliancy and importance of his service to his country. His native State was unable to pay the drafts drawn by their order for supplies. They were protested and the private property of Colonel Clark was sold to partially pay for public supplies, and impoverished and ruined by his spirited achievements he lived and died a dependant upon his brother.

I need not narrate the subsequent adventures of George Rogers Clark. It is sufficient to say that he held that territory without aid either from the United States or the State of Virginia, and became entirely impoverished as the result of his operations to secure to our country the magnificent Northwest country. He died at Louisville in poverty, and his grave is scarcely marked this day.

In introducing this bill my object was that some memorial might be made to recognize the important service of General George Rogers Clark. Yet, strange to say, so ignorant is a portion of the American people of its history that an English paper published in New York City, when this bill was introduced, said there was no such person as George Rogers Clark; that I must have meant Captain Clark, who in connection with Major Lewis conducted the expedition under the direction of Jefferson across the Mississippi and over the mountains to the Pacific Ocean. Thus the hero and founder of an empire is confounded with his less distinguished brother who near thirty years later explored the then unknown region west of the Missouri River.

Under these circumstances, when we are now celebrating in different parts of the country the acquisition of this territory and its settlement, the time is proper that a suitable monument should be erected over the grave of this distinguished and gallant soldier of the State of Virginia, more distinguished still as one of the chief defenders of the dark and bloody ground of the territory now comprising the State of Kentucky, and most of all for the conquest from British power of 260,000 square miles of the fairest portion of the globe, now filled with cities and towns innumerable and the home of sixteen million of among the most energetic and flourishing people of this great Republic.

My doubt is whether the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is a proper one. I think the monument should be erected in Washington. I do not choose to interpose in the matter against the judgment of the committee, yet I believe it would be better to place this memorial where the people of the United States can be more readily impressed with one of the greatest characters in American history. I hope the Senators from Virginia and Kentucky will see the propriety of letting the monument be erected here, although Louisville was undoubtedly the scene of his greatest distinction and where he lived and died. That city was founded by him and is his monument, but the Northwest territory was conquered by him, and the whole country was thus enriched by his brilliant achievements and should place his marble image among those selected to commemorate the few that were not born to die.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me for one observation?

It has been, I think, the policy of Congress, with the exception of the supreme name of Washington, to honor the great soldiers of the Revolution by monuments in the States where they dwelt or where their great fame was gained. In the case of George Rogers Clark—he was a native of Virginia, Kentucky then being a part of Virginia—Kentucky profited largely in the security of her frontier by his military services and Kentuckians were the sharers of his danger and his victory.

At this very session of Congress the Senate unanimously made an appropriation for a monument to General Joseph Warren, to be erected at Roxbury, Mass., now a part of the city of Boston, close to his birthplace, and it seemed to me that it was fitting that the monument of this representative Kentuckian should be erected by the nation on the soil of Kentucky beneath which General George Rogers Clark sleeps his last sleep.

It has been the singular good fortune of the people of Kentucky, both before that Territory became admitted to the Union and at a later day, in the war of 1812, to signalize the history of this country by two of the most brilliant martial exploits. One is that of George Rogers Clark, which the Senator from Ohio has just described. The other is its share in the battle of New Orleans, which is commemorated by that ballad more stirring and more like the sound of a trumpet to American ears than the ballad of Chevy Chase is to the ear of the Englishman:

> There stood John Bull in martial pomp,
> And here stood old Kentucky.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I was not aware that this bill to erect a monument to the memory of George Rogers Clark was pending until informed by the Senator from Massachusetts just before it was brought up, but I was exceedingly glad to know that such a bill was pending, and to hear the very excellent remarks in its favor which have just been made by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio. They have very justly observed that the chapter of our national history in which George Rogers Clark appears as the principal and leading figure is one which has been much neglected and is little known.

On the 5th day of July, 1776, the day after the Declaration had been rung out at Philadelphia, Patrick Henry took the oath of office as governor of Virginia. A few years before that the battle of Point Pleasant had been won against the Indians on the Ohio River, and amongst the gallant young soldiers who fought there under Andrew Lewis was Capt. George Rogers Clark, a mere stripling of some twenty-two years of age, who had been born in Albemarle County, near the home of Jefferson. While out in that expedition on the Ohio River he observed that beautiful country and some visions of its great future may have floated through his mind. He went to Kentucky in 1774, and as soon as the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed, and Patrick Henry became governor, he rode over to the mountains to Williamsburgh, in Virginia, and laid before him a plan for striking the British in the Northwest.

It was the general belief at that time that the Indian irruptions upon our border were instigated by the British officers who held the military posts at Kaskaskia, at Vincennes, and at Detroit in the Northwest, and George Rogers Clark, though yet a very young man and with very little military experience, formed a plan which showed that he had the genius of a great general and the scope of thought of a great statesman.

He was furnished by Governor Henry with some £1,200. Powder was sent out to him by way of Pittsburgh to give ammunition to his men, and under a commission as colonel in the Virginia forces, for he was not an officer of the United States and had no connection with the Continental line, he first drove the Indians from their irruptions around Maysville, Ky., and then making his headquarters at the forks of the Ohio, he struck across and captured Kaskaskia without firing a gun; then moved upon Vincennes, captured Hamilton, the British governor of the Northwest, and carried him as a prisoner to Williamsburgh with all of his soldiers, and raised over the British fortification at Vincennes, and in what is now Indiana, the flag which has floated there ever since in triumph.

The Senator from Ohio has justly observed that the decisive fact which made the lakes the northern boundary of the United States was the fact that the conquest of the Northwest Territory by George Rogers Clark, under his commission from Virginia, was conceded by the commissioners who treated for peace to have put America in its possession; and the doctrine upon which the peace commissioners went when they framed that treaty was that the tree should lie as it had fallen, and that each Government should maintain its sway over that territory which its arms had maintained and held.

There is just one other page in the history of that expedition which George Rogers Clark led and planned, which I deem not unworthy of attention. The settlement at Marietta, in Ohio, on the 7th of April, 1788, and the establishment of civil government there on the 15th day of July, 1788, one hundred years ago, are generally regarded as the first colonial establishments of America in the Northwest, and as the first erections of civil government there. They are indeed the first colonial establishments of civil governments after the Revolution, but pending the Revolution, and while the attention of the civilized world was directed to the brilliant scenes which were transpiring upon the seaboard from Massachusetts to South Carolina, Patrick Henry had erected under an act of the Legislature of Virginia in 1778 the county of Illinois, in the Northwest, had appointed Todd, as lieutenant-commander, and as a Virginia officer he had established civil government, assisted by the arms of George Rogers Clark, in all the old French settlements. And at the conclusion of the Revolutionary War the Northwest Territory in all of its settlements was under Virginia's dominion, with its civil authority in the hands of Todd, the lieutenant-commander, and its military authority in the hands of George Rogers Clark.

So thoroughly had the sway of George Rogers Clark maintained and fixed itself upon that territory that although there had been some debate upon the question of the Virginia title to the Northwest in the various contests as to the distribution of territory after the Revolution, it was ere long universally conceded that whether by charter or by conquest or the extension of civil authority over the land, Virginia had fully substantiated her claim, and recognition of it was embodied in the ordinance of 1787 for the government of that territory, and for the gradual formation in it of not less than three nor more than five States.

Mr. President, there was no hero of the Revolution who did a cleaner or better piece of work than George Rogers Clark; and there is none who can stand by him or be mentioned on the same page with him who has been so much neglected. He came to Virginia during Arnold's expedition and fought under Steuben. He went back to the West and had many adventures, and was the founder of the city of Louisville. He was the brother of the William Clark who afterwards led with Lewis the expedition beyond the Mississippi away up to the land of the Dakotas.

At the end of the Revolution he was broken in health and in spirit and in pocket, and it is related that when Virginia, recognizing his great military distinction, sent him a sword, he took the sword in his hand and looked over it and said to the member of the Legislature who brought it to him, "Your speech is very handsome, and the sword is very handsome, too. When Virginia needed a sword I gave her one. I need bread now and she sends me a sword, and what can I do with it?"

He was buried, with simply his initials upon his tomb, at Locust Grove, in Kentucky. More recently his remains have been transferred to the cemetery at Louisville; but as yet nowhere in the United States has any monument arisen upon which his name is engraved. I shall be gratified indeed, sir, if before the people of Ohio have ceased to commemorate by their centennial celebration the great memories which are being revived before them now, that those who shall mingle with them shall be able to say that, although it was in the eleventh hour, yet here ere the stroke of twelve, the country which he so faithfully served has enacted a law under which a monument to the great hero, the Hannibal of the Northwest, who might have been called its father, is in process of erection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts has been agreed to, has it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been, and is concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR Let the bill be read as it will stand amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as it stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in recognition of the eminent services to his country of General George Rogers Clark, in the occupation and conquest of the Northwestern Territory during the Revolutionary war, the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting in the city of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, a monument to his memory, to be expended under the direction and control of the Secretary of War. And said monument shall be located on a suitable site in said city, said site and the title thereto to be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I do not rise to antagonize the locality of this most merited monument to a great soldier. I do rise, however, to say that the bill ought not to pass without a word from the State of Indiana. On her soil culminated the greatest achievement of George Rogers Clark. At Vincennes he covered himself with a glory that can not perish and placed himself in the category of the foremost military captains of ancient or modern times.

It does seem to me, sir, that there his monument ought to be; there where he forded the Wabash River and with his little army environed the British post commanded by the infamous Hamilton; there where he addressed Hamilton in those immortal words of reproach, contempt, and aggressive menance as "the hair buyer of the British army;" there it would seem his country should erect his monument; there it should tower to the skies and bear witness to his fame.

The British Government, true to its barbarous instincts, at that time, as it is at all times, and would be again to-day if the opportunity presented itself, was in strict alliance with savages in making war on the American people.

In order to excite and inflame still further their ferocity and savagery, a price was offered to the Indians by this commanding officer of the British forces at Vincennes for the scalps of men, women, and children. Such were the allies of Great Britain in the Northwest, such they were along the lakes and rivers of the North and East, and throughout all the South during the whole war of the Revolution, and such again were the allies of this boasted Christian power during the war of 1812.

I know of no other power in ancient or modern history that has made alliances and treaties offensive and defensive with savage barbarians whose mode of warfare was the indiscriminate carnage and slaughter of the defenseless of all ages and both sexes.

Hamilton, in command at Vincennes, offered and had a standing offer circulated amongst the Indians that he would give a stated price for American scalps; and when the immortal hero, George Rogers Clark, with his starving army at his back, surrounded the British forces he did not address him as "Colonel Hamilton," he did not address him with terms of respect, but he styled him in writing as "Hair-buyer," and demanding his surrender at once, with the "alternative that he would storm the place and put its defenders to the sword;" and when Hamilton was forced to surrender he lay long in irons, and it is a satisfaction to know, even at this late day, that he would have been put to death if General Clark had been permitted to have his own way.

Sir, I live in a county named for the man who saved the army that captured Vincennes from starvation. When George Rogers Clark reached Kaskaskia, in his Northwestern expedition, his army had not a single ration. They were living on a scant allowance of parched corn, and Francis Vigo, a native, I believe, of Switzerland, a trader who had credit at New Orleans on two bills of exchange, one for $5,000 and the other for $4,000, secured supplies which saved that army from perishing in the wilderness. And may I not add that nearly one hundred years passed away before the money which thus saved an army and brought imperishable honor to the American arms was refunded to the descendants of the great public benefactor who advanced it? It was during the last term I served in the other end of the Capitol, then being a member of the Judiciary Committee, that I secured the passage of a bill to pay to the descendants of Francis Vigo the money, with interest, which he had expended in the cause of American independence, and I had the intense satisfaction of seeing this Government at last pay $50,000 on this glorious but long-neglected account.

Colonel Vigo died in the beautiful town where I live, very poor, but not neglected, directing by his will, if his claim was ever paid, that enough of it should be taken with which to buy a bell for the court-house in Terre Haute, in order, I presume, that its ringing tones might remind the people that he had lived and died in their midst. His request has been complied with in the last two years, and now the court-house bell daily proclaims that Vigo County, Indiana, is the last resting-place of the brave, the gentle, the patriotic friend of freedom and of humanity, Col. Francis Vigo.

With these and other events connected with the immortal campaign of General Clark in my mind, I did not feel, although only this moment coming into the Senate, and the bill being now on its passage, that I could remain entirely silent, coming here as I do from the banks of the Wabash, the theater of his greatest glory, and of his greatest usefulness to his country.

We have a county on the Ohio River, the county in which Jeffersonville stands, called for this great hero, Clark County. I am not going, however, to oppose my neighbors in Kentucky having the honor of his monument. He was their citizen, and lived and died with them. It ought indeed to be on both sides of the river were such a thing possible. There ought to be another monument at Vincennes; and in every State in the whole Northwest. Another should be erected for his brother, William Clark, who with Meriwether Lewis led that immortal expedition under Jefferson, discovered the headwaters of the Missouri, crossed the Rocky Mountains where the Northern Pacific Railway lies now, and looked upon the Pacific Ocean from the mouth of the Columbia River. Lost to civilization and lost to the knowledge of the world for more than two years, when they returned to St. Louis they returned laden with the spoils of great discoveries. They returned with more honor and utility than Xenophon with his ten thousand Greeks.

I have no more to say, except to concur with the eloquent Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] that this is tardy action upon a great subject. It is a reproach to the American people and to the Northwest that this movement has not been made long ago.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am more than glad to see that there is an absolute concurrence of opinion as to the site to be selected for this monument. There is an eminent propriety in locating it in the city of Louisville. That city constituted the basis of this general's operations. He was the founder of the present metropolis of that Commonwealth; it was there that he spent the last years of his life, and it comes as near being the center as can well be selected of the territory that came to our public domain by reason of his military exploits.

All that has been said and so well said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] can be substantiated and will not be controverted; but either of those Senators might have said one thing more with equal truth, that but for the military services of the man whom to-day we propose to honor the Alleghany chain would in all probability have been the basis of settlement between the United States and Great Britain, for before that the operations of the Federal Army were confined exclusively to the section of country between that chain of mountains, the Alleghanies, and the Atlantic Ocean. For this great and measureless empire that came to us in the Northwest we are indebted, in my judgment, to George Rogers Clark alone.

If that be true, as it is admitted, the great metropolis upon the Ohio's bank where he lived and died and of which he was the founder, which is as near to the center as you can get of this empire which he brought to the domain of the country, in my judgment is the most proper site that could possibly be selected, and I wish to express my gratification that there should have been no bickering East or West and that there should have been no hesitation either upon the part of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, or upon the part of the Senator from Ohio, or upon the part of the Senator from Virginia, whose State is justly proud as being his birthplace, or upon the part of the Senator from Indiana, who represents the one great Commonwealth in the Northwest that owed him most. I am more than gratified and pleased to find that all have agreed that the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts has properly selected the place, the spot on which this monument should be built to this great man's memory.

I thank all of the Senators for the selection they have made and the justice they have done both to the dead man and to the State that was honored by claiming him as a citizen.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE AT CUMMINGS' LANDING, ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 3215) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Cummings' Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was passed, and also the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading, may be reconsidered, in order that I may correct a mistake in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the votes by which this bill was passed and by which it was ordered to a third reading may be reconsidered. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. BERRY. Now I move, in the last line of section 4, before the word "proofs," to strike out the word "of" and insert "and;" so as to read:

And upon rules and condition which each shall perform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. R. THOMAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 335) granting an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas, which was at the end of the bill, to add, "and pay him a pension of $12 a month;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas, whose pension certificate is numbered 120171, and pay him a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1258) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Waters;
An act (S. 1435) granting a pension to Emil Schattle;
An act (S. 1742) granting a pension to W. A. Hicks;
An act (S. 322) to authorize the Southwestern Arkansas and Indian Territory Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Ouachita River, in Arkansas;
An act (S. 560) to authorize the Columbia River Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, and to establish it as a post road;

An act (S. 1526) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Caney Fork River, between Rock Island and Carthage, in Tennessee;
An act (S. 1882) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Clinton, Iowa;
An act (S. 1883) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Muscatine, Iowa;
An act (S. 2199) authorizing the Little Rock and Alexandria Railway Company to maintain and construct a bridge across Bayou d'Arbonne, in Louisiana; and
An act (S. 2674) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., and for other purposes.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty (Executive M) between United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the fishery treaty now pending is the first ever considered and discussed in open executive session of the Senate. The Senate is about one hundred years old, and its rule requiring all treaties to be considered and disposed of in executive session with closed doors and under the injunction of secrecy is as old as the Government and has its foundation in the wisdom of our fathers, who adopted it for reasons that have withstood the trial and secured the sanction of a century of experience. The reasons on which the rule is founded grow out of and are inseparable from the nature of the negotiations to which they relate. A treaty is the act of two or more separate Governments for the adjustment of differences between them relating to common rights and interests. The reasons which induce each separate Government to make or reject treaties concern them alone. Neither of the negotiating governments has any right, or has ever claimed any right, to learn from the other why it proposes, ratifies, or rejects treaties. What each government proposes to do in treaty-making is its own business. No government has ever asked that her ministers be admitted to the councils of the President and his Cabinet or the deliberations of the Senate when a treaty is under consideration for ratification or rejection. The Government of the United States is a Government of the people, and its treaty-making power is vested in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President negotiates with the representatives of foreign governments for the formation of treaties, and when he comes to his conclusion that a treaty he has negotiated with a foreign government is a proper one to be made by the United States, he submits that treaty to the Senate as a joint custodian of the power for its consideration.

When the treaty is before the Senate the question is, will the Senate agree to the treaty negotiated by the President, or will the Senate amend the treaty and put it in such terms as the Senate will sanction, or will the Senate decline to amend, or to exercise its power to improve the treaty, and reject it? It takes the vote of two-thirds of the Senate to ratify a treaty. One vote over one-third of the Senate can defeat a treaty. So that it is manifest the Senate has more power than the President in treaty-making. When the President undertakes to negotiate a treaty with a foreign government he considers the matter with his confidential adviser, the Secretary of State, and in the preparation of the terms of a treaty he intends submitting to another government he does so without making public his deliberations. When the President finishes what he has to do in making a treaty he sends it to the Senate in confidence in executive session. After the President submits the proposed treaty to the Senate he has nothing more to do with it until the Senate comes to its conclusion.

If the Senate makes no amendment by a majority vote, and less than two-thirds vote to ratify it, the treaty is killed. But if the Senate amends the treaty it is returned by the Senate to the President for his approval of the amendments, and if he approves them they are submitted by the President to the foreign government for its approval. It thus appears that the treaty now before the Senate is a long distance from its becoming one of the supreme laws of the land. The proposed treaty is in the earliest stages of its formation. It has no existence whatever. It is only under consideration, and is nothing more than the subject of negotiation between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States. While in this transition or formative state the rule of the Senate requiring treaties to be considered and acted on with closed doors and under the injunction of secrecy has been suspended by a solid Republican against a solid Democratic vote, so as to open the doors of the executive session and conduct the future negotiation with Great Britain upon the subject of the proposed arrangement as to fisheries and fishing rights and commercial privileges of fishing vessels and fishermen in Canadian bays and ports on the coast of British North America in the hearing of our adversaries, so that Her Majesty's Government and all the people of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland may enjoy the advantage to them of the divisions among the people of the United States and their Senators and President as witnessed by our adversaries, who are invited to our public discussions of what shall be the terms of the proposed treaty.

Our forefathers decided, as all other civilized people had decided, that treaty discussions and treaty making should be conducted in secret, and that it would be unwise and detrimental to the public service to give our adversaries in treaty making the advantage of knowing what they would be glad to learn, all our views and opinions and divisions, and the reasons for them, before the terms of any settlement were finally adjusted. By the suspension of the rule and throwing the discussions among ourselves open to the hearing of our adversaries we certainly give them a great advantage they have no right to enjoy. If the terms of the treaty sent us by the President are not satisfactory to Senators, why not make known the grounds of objection to the Senate under the injunction of secrecy and endeavor to avoid the objections and remedy the defects in the treaty by proper amendments?

Is it a wise, judicious, and becoming exercise of a great constitutional power vested in the Senate of the United States as the tribunal of last resort in treaty making to refuse to advise with the President as to the terms of an important treaty he has negotiated and sent to the Senate for its consideration? The question before the Senate is, will we ratify the treaty without amendment? If the treaty is defective, the question is, can it be amended so as to improve it or make it satisfactory? If the treaty can not be amended, if it is not in the power of the Senate to propose changes that will make the treaty such as the Senate will approve, then it is certainly an admission by the Senate that it is not in the power of the President or the Senate to make any treaty the Senate would ratify.

If the President, with the aid of his able and accomplished Secretary of State, and the assistance of plenipotentiaries, whose skill and ability and uncorruptibility in treaty-making can not be questioned, have shown themselves unequal to the task of formulating a treaty that is satisfactory to the majority of the Senate, having the power to make amendments, how can that majority retire from its responsibility expressly imposed on it by the Constitution of so amending the defects, if any, in the treaty as to make it satisfactory to them, and instead of discharging its plain duty the majority arrest the negotiation in the midst of its progress for the manifest partisan purpose of arraigning the President and his Secretary and the plenipotentiaries, and putting them on trial before the British Government and the people of the United States for failing to formulate such a treaty as the Senate will ratify, when the Senate at the same time pronounces judgment against its own ability to frame any better treaty, or any treaty whatever, upon the same subject of contention between the two governments?

Here we stand as a Senate, before the world, engaged in a partisan trial of a joint custodian of the constitutional power to make treaties, and having prejudged the case against him in secret session, we throw open the doors of the Senate to make public our judgment of condemnation, forgetting that we expose our own dereliction of duty and convict ourselves of a much higher offense than we have undertaken to make out by the proof against the President and those who aided him in the negotiation. The President has exercised his best ability in good faith to discharge an important public duty and has submitted his work to the Senate to accept it or to amend its defects.

The President tells the Senate that he has done the best he could, and asks the Senate to examine his work fairly, as a joint custodian of the power to make the treaty, and, if found defective, to submit to him the defects and the amendments proposed to remedy them, and he will give them due consideration, and if he approves he will refer the amendments to the British Government. How does the Senate exercise its joint power and discharge its joint duty? Can the Senate go before the country to try a co-ordinate department of the Government for formulating a worthless treaty, and ask that the President be condemned and punished for not presenting a better treaty, when the Senate has as much power and is under the same obligation as is imposed on the President to make treaties that are free from objection, and has offered him no aid or assistance?

The President informs the Senate that he sees no defects in the treaty, and thinks it the best settlement that can be made of the differences. The Senate instantly assails the treaty, proceeds to expose its alleged defects in open session, and confessing to full knowledge of its imperfections, and having ample power and opportunity, offers no amendment, makes no effort to do what they condemn the President for doing so imperfectly, and only propose to exercise the power of rejecting the proposed treaty and closing the door to further negotiation.

Is it not manifest that the Republican majority have willfully shirked an important constitutional and sworn duty and placed the Senate before the country in the disreputable attitude I have described for no other than supposed political and partisan considerations? How can such a party be trusted with the custody of political power?

No Senator believes that any member of this body objects to making known to his constituents everything he knows about any treaty that comes before the Senate. It was for the protection and safety of our own people in treaty-making with foreign governments that the rule requiring secret sessions was adopted, and has been made sacred by the strict observance of great and honorable statesmen for a century. No case can be made strong enough to justify a suspension of the rule. There can be no treaty made with a foreign government under any circumstances that would make it safe or proper to invite our adversaries into the Senate to hear discussion among ourselves of the terms of any treaty with the United States. The moment the propriety of an exception to the rule is admitted the rule itself is destroyed. An exception once made, the precedent is established and political and partisan reasons will always be found for throwing treaty-making into the political arena, and the dignity, power, and efficiency of the Senate in discharging its important constitutional function will be greatly impaired.

But we are in open session, and the treaty and the President are on trial before the world by a co-ordinate department of our Government. The prosecution has been opened by the two Senators from Maine and one of the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who have been selected to open the fire on the President with a broadside on account of their skill and experience in such warfare, and especially on account of their perfect familiarity with every inch of ground to be occupied in the conflict, and their relation as the immediate representatives of the only parties admitted to be really interested in the defeat of the pending treaty.

The first charge against the President and his "plenipotentiaries" is, that no one familiar with the subject of negotiation and qualified to give all useful and necessary information and to cope with the trained diplomats on the British side were invited into consultation when the terms of the treaty were being formulated.

How much truth and merit can be found in this charge? The President was aided in the negotiation by his Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, and by William L. Putnam and James B. Angell. The ability of Mr. Bayard to comprehend and fully understand all the grounds of contention between the two governments and his fidelity to public duty are too well established to require any defense before the American people. The two distinguished gentlemen who aided Mr. Bayard in the negotiation are conceded by the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts to be eminent lawyers and well equipped in diplomatic ability. Mr. Putnam is an old resident of Maine, and having been associated with trials in the Dominion and other courts involving fishery rights and the fishery business of Americans in Canadian waters, was familiar with the questions to be settled by the negotiation.

Then, again, the whole field of contention and every aspect of all the grievances of our fishermen had been fully explored and illuminated by the Senate committee appointed for the special purpose and made up partly by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRY], who had called before them the life-long experts in the fishing business in Canadian waters and selected for examination on account of their thorough personal knowledge of the whole subject in all its relations, bearings, and aspects, theoretically and practically, and these skilled and interested and representative witnesses were subjected to examination and cross-examination by the able Senators and lawyers from Vermont and Maine, themselves familiar with the subjects upon which the Senate desired information.

All this testimony of a regiment of Maine and Massachusetts fishermen was reported to the Senate and printed in 1886, and had been in the possession of the President and Mr. Bayard long before they entered upon the negotiation of the pending treaty. All the correspondence between the two governments and all the treaties upon the subject exhaustive of fishery rights and fishery troubles and contention were familiar to the President and Mr. Bayard.

Mr. President, I feel constrained to declare my belief that the complaint made by the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts against the President and Mr. Bayard, that they had ignored those who could have been most useful to them in the negotiation, and acted in the dark and without illumination from Maine and Massachusetts, is utterly unfounded and entirely destitute of worth or merit.

But in what position do these Senators from Maine and Massachusetts leave themselves in arraigning the President and Secretary of State on the charge of having negotiated the pending treaty in ignorance of important information? These Senators have equal power with the President in making a proper treaty, and the amount of study they have devoted to the discovery of the many imperfections they allege against it has certainly qualified them in a most eminent degree to exercise judiciously and wisely their power of amending the pending treaty. Why not employ their exceptional advantages over the President and his Secretary of State in making a satisfactory treaty, and come to their assistance by offering such amendments as will supply the failures and remedy the defects of the present treaty?

What a pity it is that these Senators are not able to see the beam in their own eyes while pointing out the mote in the eyes of the President and his Secretary of State. The American people are watching this trial of the President from a different standpoint and with higher motives and purposes, and they will make no mistake in their verdict.

Mr. President, I listened with some pleasure and much regret to the remarkable speech of the Senator from Massachusetts on the pending treaty. I was pleased with the ability and learning exhibited in his elaborate oration. It was faultless in composition and admirable in scholarship. But with all these qualities the speech abounds in declamation and sophistry, and the subject that received the least of the Senator's attention was the one before the Senate.

The Senator paid a splendid and deserving tribute to the manly qualities of the New England fishermen, as illustrated in the history of our naval warfare. His description of the fishery industry, employing many thousand men, with a magnificent fleet, on the perilous coasts and waters of British North America, was imposing, and I can imagine no stupidity short of idiocy that would deny the inestimable value and importance of this training school for seamen in our preparation for naval warfare. But how much does all this eloquence have to do in rendering a correct judgment on the terms of the pending treaty? Who is so un-American, so unpatriotic, or so unworthy of common respect as to desire that anything shall be done to cripple or impair our fisheries or fishery industry, or to withhold from them the full measure of security and protection, and to see to it that they shall have and enjoy every right and privilege to which American citizens are entitled when engaged in an honorable pursuit under treaty stipulations or the obligations of international law?

If it can be shown that the present treaty falls short of what our fishermen have a clear right to demand, or deprives them of any valuable right to which they are entitled under existing laws or treaties, it can not get my support and certainly should be rejected. But how are we aided in our examination of the terms of the proposed treaty by eloquent and gratifying tributes to the gallantry and daring of the American fishermen? Then, again, the Senator entertained and startled us with the panoramic picture he drew of the magnitude and splendor of British dominion, and the wonderful progress she had made in wrapping her coil around the vitals of the globe. This is admitted to be the masterly achievement of English diplomacy and statesmanship. How has American statesmanship been employed in the mean time in full view of the giant strides of England to world-wide supremacy in commerce and industrial development?

We have had remarkable success in home growth and enterprise, on account of our marvelous resources and the extraordinary energies and capabilities of our people, and in a few years, under the cover of high taxation—imposed by the Republican party for the purpose of establishing a monopoly of American markets for a favored few, with the power, which they have greedily exercised, of measuring their own exactions of consumers—more millionaires have been manufactured and more wealth accumulated in corporations than can be found elsewhere in the world's history. The unprecedented wealth and its merciless power, brought into existence by an unconstitutional and oppressive prostitution of the taxing power of the Government, is to-day a standing menace to popular government and popular rights and liberty. The Senator from Massachusetts has devoted a long life and great ability and learning to the creation and service of this monopoly, and most faithfully and efficiently has he represented the conspiracy of Massachusetts manufacturers with the Republican party to seize the Federal Government and employ its taxing power in the interest of a few and against the welfare of the many.

He may stir the ashes of the dead past to find the fires of sectional hate that will always animate and warm the souls of some Republicans by the unfounded and wholly gratuitous charge of a "conspiracy of the old slaveholders of the South with British manufacturers" against American industry. Such low flings for petty partisan uses coming from the accomplished Senator from the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which has reaped such a rich harvest from Southern fields cultivated by "the old slaveholders," surprise me, and are strangely inconsistent with many manly and generous utterances I have heard from that Senator about "the old slaveholders of the South."

While Great Britain has been widening her dominions and planting her red-cross flag on every continent, island, and stronghold on the globe, and floating it over every sea, the American Government has been prostituted to the erection of iron walls around our markets and the withdrawal of the stripes and stars from every ocean so that a favored class may monopolize American markets and dictate prices to American consumers; and this is lauded as the American policy of protection.

The Senator from Massachusetts, as a part of his purpose to humiliate and degrade President Cleveland and his administration in the estimation of his countrymen and the world, contrasted the diplomacy of the President and Mr. Bayard with the diplomacy of the past century of our existence as a government. I challenge a comparison of our present relations with foreign countries and the efficiency, ability, and character of our representation in foreign courts under the administration of the State Department by Mr. Bayard with any administration under any Republican President or Secretary of State. I send back the charge that President Cleveland and Secretary Bayard have been unmindful of the rights of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters and tolerant of outrages against these vessels. In the language of the Senator from Massachusetts as to another matter, I say "it is no such thing." How long has it been that the fishing vessels of Maine and Massachusetts have been treated outrageously in Canadian waters?

I find in a letter of Richard D. Cutts to Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, dated April 7, 1865, the following language:

> As to the restrictions imposed by the Colonies to prevent the privileges of shelter, etc., from being abused by American fishermen: The fishermen of the United States are frequently compelled by rough weather, or by injuries to their vessels received in a gale, or in consequence of collision or other accident to seek the nearest port for shelter and repairs. And it is also necessary at stated intervals, while they are engaged during the summer and fall in following their avocation, that they should take on board a supply of wood and water; and for either of these purposes they have the right, so long as the treaty of 1818 continues in force, to resort to the bays and harbors of the different provinces.
> Some of the Colonial laws, especially those of Nova Scotia, enacted to prevent the abuse of these privileges, are of such a stringent character as to almost annul the right or make it at least hazardous for American fishermen to attempt to enjoy it. Seizures are made on the slightest suspicion or on false pretenses, or charges; heavy bonds are required before suit can be instituted to recover; the owner of the vessel must bring the charges, and if unsuccessful he is mulcted in treble costs beside the loss of vessel and cargo.

The above statute of Nova Scotia and the brutal, unchristian, and barbarious wrongs and outrages perpetrated on fishing vessels from Maine and Massachusetts under this statute were permitted to go unredressed, and this statute, more aggressive and outrageous than the one cited by the Senator from Massachusetts, has been permitted by Republican Presidents and Secretaries to continue in operation for twenty years before Mr. Cleveland became President.

The Senator from Massachusetts parades a long list of "American vessels seized, detained, or warned off from Canadian ports during the last year." The Senator omitted to state that this list included merchant as well as fishing vessels boarded. It also appears from the reported list that 700 of the vessels in 1886 and 1,362 in 1887 "were boarded to investigate their conduct," and out of the whole number 30 only were brought to the attention of the British Government, 400 were involved in seizures and other interferences growing out of disputed constructions of the treaty of 1818, and out of the whole number of seizures about 150 were reported to the Federal Government for examination and redress, and 115 of these have been the subject of diplomatic complaint to Great Britain by Secretary Bayard, who characterized the acts of Canadian officials in some of these cases as "outrageous," "brutal," "inhospitable," and "inhuman." Mr. Bayard is pledged to the owners of these vessels in his own language, that—

> Reparation for all losses unlawfully caused by foreign authority will be the subject of international presentation and demand.

Have the owners of the fishing vessels of Maine and Massachusets ever had any more attention or as much attention from Republican Presidents or Secretaries?

But the Senator from Massachusetts complains that—

> We are now quietly told in the corner of a report that these claims have not been considered, as some demands are made against us for interfering with seal fisheries in the North Pacific, and both subjects are adjourned to a future time.

Is it a just cause of complaint that the question of reparation to our fishing vessels is separated from the subjects of our differences about their fishery and commercial rights and privileges to be enjoyed hereafter in Canadian ports and postponed for future settlement?

It seems to me that the ratification of the pending treaty would determine the basis for future negotiation for "reparation for all losses unlawfully caused by foreign authority." If the pending treaty is defeated, then the whole field of contention is left open, and the question of reparation indefinitely postponed. Every step in the negotiation for damages claimed by our fishing vessels encounters questions decided by the pending treaty, and because the Senator from Massachusetts objects to his constituents being referred to the adjudications of the pending treaty to determine their right to recover damages, he protests against the separation of reparation and ratification, and demands that payment of damages to his constituents shall antedate any permanent adjustment of rules and regulations for future observance to secure peace and harmony.

The position and motives of the Republican majority in the Senate on the matters now before the Senate can not be misunderstood by the people. But we will try them on their position as they have defined it, and it is that the rights of fishing vessels of the United States when engaged in fishing in the bays of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland are as clearly defined by the treaties of 1783 and 1818 as they can be by treaty, and, being already clearly defined by those treaties, it is useless to make another treaty upon the subject of fishery rights. It is also claimed by Republican Senators who oppose the pending treaty that by the act of Congress and the proclamation of the President and the British order in council in 1830, and the principles of international law, the fishing vessels of the United States having a trade permit to enter Canadian ports are thereby converted into merchant vessels as to all the rights and privileges of all vessels of every description of the most favored nations when they enter Canadian ports. In other words, that as to commercial rights our fishing vessels are no more restricted in privileges than merchant vessels in Canadian ports with trade permits under the act of 1830.

If the treaty of 1818 defines its own meaning, without leaving anything to construction, then it is settled that no other treaty can be made to define the fishery rights that are already as clearly set forth as they can be by the treaty of 1818, construed in connection with the treaty of 1783 and contemporaneous opinion. If the power of language has been exhausted in the treaties of 1783 and 1818 to express the intention of the two governments as to fishery rights of American fishing vessels in Canadian or British fishing waters on the coasts or bays of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, then it is certainly useless to make another treaty in different language to express the same meaning. And so as to the intent, meaning, and purpose of the reciprocal act of 1830 and the force and effect of international law. If this contention of Republican Senators as to what is already certainly settled by the treaty of 1818 and the reciprocal act of 1830 is as well founded as they state, then it follows necessarily that there is nothing left to be done by further negotiation resulting in another treaty unless the two governments are willing to make another treaty to amend so as to enlarge or restrict the existing arrangements.

If we are to stand on the treaty of 1818 as a finality, as urged by Republican Senators, and also on the act of 1830 as they construe its meaning, it is manifest that the argument is exhausted, and nothing remains but for the Government of the United States to see to it that American fishing vessels enjoy all the rights, of every description, to which they are entitled according to the construction of Republican Senators of the treaty of 1818 and the reciprocal act of 1830. Should Her Majesty's Government differ with the opponents of the pending treaty as to the character and extent of the privileges of our fishing vessels in Canadian bays under the treaty of 1818 and the act of 1830, and should offer to come to some understanding on the points of difference to avoid the evils of non-intercourse and the consequent hostility that might endanger the peaceful relations of the two greatest governments in the world, then the Senate will be concluded by its action on the proposed treaty against further negotiation, and all the consequences, however serious, must be inevitable.

It is important, then, in this aspect of our present and future relations with the people of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, and of the British Government, that we pause and look ahead and survey the field we are invited to enter by Republican Senators for speculative political advantages. In the first place it may be well for us to inquire who are the parties really and materially interested in this serious contention about fishery rights and commercial privileges of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters, and what is really involved. We all understand that according to the forms and ceremonies of international negotiation the Government of Great Britain is one party and the Government of the United States is the other party to this controversy. But the people of the United States are a practical, manly, and courageous people, not afraid to do right or to resist wrong, and I apprehend they would like to be informed what this quarrel is about; who are making this fuss and for what.

It will not be denied that on the side called the United States those who are solely interested are that portion of the people of Maine and Massachusetts who are engaged in the fishing business—that is, catching fish in the bays or waters on the coasts of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland. And on the other side, called the British side, the only people really interested are the people of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland engaged in the same business in the same bays or waters. England, Ireland, and Scotland are separated from these fishing waters by 3,000 miles of ocean, and the people there enjoy no pecuniary benefits and suffer no injuries from anything claimed or denied by either side of this controversy. So the Irish voters the Republicans are fishing for will find nothing in the rejection of this treaty to mortify or punish England.

The people of thirty-six out of the thirty-eight United States would derive no more benefit nor suffer any more injury from what is claimed for our fishermen under the treaty of 1818 and the act of 1830 as they stand than what these people of the thirty-six States would enjoy under the pending treaty if it were ratified, and no living man can prove the contrary.

But it makes no difference whether the people engaged in fishing are the only persons interested. If these fishermen are really and honestly and fairly entitled to the rights and privileges claimed by them or for them under the treaty of 1818 and the reciprocal act of 1830, then all the people in every State of our Union are interested in having these rights and privileges protected and enforced by the Government of the United States.

But in considering the treaty before the Senate we should endeavor to look higher than the plane upon which we are invited by the Republican Senators in their reckless contests for political advantage, and try to discharge our duty as Senators invested with the power of peace and war in treaty-making with foreign governments, without subordinating the far-reaching questions involved in the pending treaty and the serious consequences of our action to petty partisan experiments for party benefit or advantage. Let us endeavor not to be misled into wrongdoing and reckless experiments by inflammatory appeals to American prejudice. On the contrary it is right and becoming in us to honestly examine that we may fully understand all the facts and all the rights and interests involved, and to be affected by the probable results of the contention between these two great countries.

Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland lie broadside of the United States on our northern boundary, and in extent of territory are about equal to the United States. The vast region of country and the millions of hardy and courageous people occupying it are under the jurisdiction of the Government of Great Britain. For purposes of local government Canada has her Dominion Parliament and Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have their provincial legislatures. These people live on our border and are our neighbors, engaged in the same pursuits, with similar productions, trade, and commerce, and have the same aspirations and destiny. Common sense, common honesty, and common interests would make the people of these provinces and the people of the United States friends and useful neighbors. Reciprocal trade and commerce would exchange millions in their neighboring markets.

There can be but one opinion as to the policy that is wisest and best for both of these neighboring countries in their intercourse with each other. It seems like the most extreme folly and the most unaccountable stupidity for either country to deliberately adopt a practice or treatment that can have no other effect than to inflame counter passions and prejudices, and feelings of distrust, hostility, and resentment, ending in commercial antagonism and estrangement and damaging non-intercourse. Practically the reasons for free and friendly trade between the several States of our Union are the same for like intercourse between the people of the provinces and the people of the United States. We should invite and cultivate friendly association and intercourse instead of rivalry, jealousy, and resentment.

We know all about the ambition of England for dominion, and especially for commercial supremacy. It can not escape the suggestion of common sense or ordinary intelligence that the greed and sagacity of England will discover in the conflicts and quarrels between the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts, and the people of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, and in the policy commended and supported by Republican Senators, exactly what England needs and most desires to keep her subjects in these provinces from establishing intimate and friendly commercial intercourse and relations with the United States, which would be especially beneficial to the merchants, manufacturers, producers, and carriers of those States on the border of these provinces. England rejoices in our quarrels with our neighbors, not to make war, but to cause alienation, and to drive the people in these neighboring provinces as far from us as possible in their trade and commerce.

England has nothing to lose, but everything to gain by our non-intercourse. These people are naturally our friends and could be made so in practice by commercial intercourse. It is evidently our wisest and best policy to be liberal, tolerant, and forbearing with these neighboring people. The United States can afford to be generous to her neighbors north and south of her boundaries on the American continent. England watches with far-reaching statesmanship the conditions and relations of countries and governments, and there is nothing she fails to see and understand, and whatever is to her advantage is instantly appropriated. England watches our contention with Canada about fish and fishery rights and fish markets, and while she is ready to soften the asperities engendered by our quarrels, she takes advantage of the situation, and goes to work with all her power to centralize and bind these provinces together with great trunk railways from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, constructed by unprecedented governmental subsidies, and made immensely tributary to her military and naval power, and to her political dominion and commercial supremacy.

While England is thus working out her marvelous destiny by stretching her power across this continent in full view of our border, and making her lodgement on the coast of the Pacific to grapple with us for eastern traffic and transportation, the United States is worrying and fretting and taxing her statesmanship in a quarrel with Canada about fish, and fish markets for free or taxed fish. We are in this humiliating attitude, and however mortifying the spectacle may be in history it is our duty to do the best we can to solve the problem and extricate ourselves from the perplexities of the situation. We have made four treaties with Great Britain for the purpose of settling these troubles about fish, and after thirty years' trial of the treaty of 1854, and fifteen years trial of the treaty of 1871, they were both abrogated by the United States for the sole reason that they allowed Canadian fish to be sold in our markets free of duty.

The abrogation of the treaties of 1854 and 1871 in relation to reciprocal fishery rights of fishing vessels in Canadian and American waters originated in and was caused by the same local quarrel between the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts and the fishermen of Canada about fishery rights in Canadian waters and free fish in American markets. The inconsiderate and suicidal policy which terminated the treaties of 1854 and 1871 threw both countries back upon the treaty of 1818, with its renunciations and restrictions of American fishery rights and privileges in Canadian waters. And when we discovered the practical operation of the treaty of 1818, as compared with the treaties of 1854 and 1871, the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts and their representatives conceived the idea for the first time in fifty years' existence of the reciprocal act of 1830 of resorting to that act for relief from the severe and irritating restrictions of the treaty of 1818, and the provincial legislation, which the treaty authorizes to enforce them, and prevent abuse by American fishermen.

The gravamen of the complaint against the pending treaty by the majority report and the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts is that it fails to secure to American fishing vessels the same commercial rights and privileges in Canadian ports that are enjoyed by merchant vessels in the ports of the most favored nations. I charge that this clamor about commercial rights and liberties of American fishing vessels in Canadian ports is nothing but the rattle of sheet-iron on the Republican stage, and is not real thunder. Who has undertaken to define these commercial rights? What are these commercial privileges? Who has authority to determine what are the commercial privileges desired by our fishing vessels in addition to shelter, repairs, wood, and water, reserved in the treaty of 1818?

What do we find in the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Gloucester Master Mariners' Association at Gloucester, Mass., April 13, 1888, and it is the voice of all the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts?

Whereas in every treaty between Great Britain and the United States since 1783 the rights of American fishermen have been sacrificed.

There is a wide difference between the Senator from Massachusetts and his constituents as to the effect of the treaty of 1818. But here is the milk in the cocoanut:

And whereas both treaty and protocol are but the initiatory steps towards the complete surrender of the markets of the United States, by which the fisheries of Canada will be developed and enlarged and those of the United States depleted and destroyed: Therefore,

Resolved, That this association, composed of the masters of American fishing vessels, who know by contact and experience the full significance of Canadian diplomacy, have neither used nor desired to use Canadian waters for practical fishing, but simply ask that our commercial rights therein shall be defined by our own Government, and when so defined, maintained.

Why are they not defined by amendment of the pending treaty? But again it is resolved—

That the American ocean fisheries are not dependent upon any favor or privilege to be granted by Canada, but, on the contrary, the natural resources of our own country and the high seas afford everything necessary for the prosecution of our business.

What becomes of the clamor for the privilege to American fishermen to enter Canadian ports to purchase bait and provisions and fishing outfits to carry on the fishing business on the deep seas? No, Mr. President, the sole reason for the opposition to the pending treaty is perfectly transparent. It is found nowhere else in the treaty except in the fifteenth article. In this article the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts see free fish.

If the fifteenth article were eliminated from the treaty, and still better, if it never had appeared in the treaty, there would have been no fatal opposition to its ratification. The Gloucester master fishermen sounded the key-note, and all of Maine and Massachusetts joined in the chorus. "Both treaty and protocol are but the initiatory steps towards the complete surrender of the markets of the United States to Canadian fishermen" is the signal gun. Well do I remember what I saw and heard in secret session when the pending treaty was under consideration, and as everything has been uncovered and we are at liberty to make it public, I state that Republican Senators, and conspicuously the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] announced their intention to offer amendments to the pending treaty, and it was generally understood that amendments were to be offered.

I further state that it was on account of this announcement and understanding that the proposition for open sessions was reconsidered and voted down, only three votes having been given for open sessions. And it was not until the Republican Senators took the treaty out of the Senate and in secret caucus determined that no amendments should be offered that the proposition for open sessions was revived and carried. In the face of these facts it is amazing to me to hear the Senator from Massachusetts affect so much indignation at the intimation that political considerations should enter into the negotiation of the pending treaty. I further state that the Senator from Ohio in secret session announced the substance of the amendment he intended to offer, and it was to strike out the fifteenth article, thus removing the ground for the apprehension that free fish was in the treaty.

Had it not been for the fifteenth article and the menace of free fish we never would have heard of this outcry for commercial rights and reciprocity and this outburst of affected indignation against the sacrifices and surrenders of the pending treaty. It is exactly the same clamor that is raised against the Mills bill, and for the same reasons. There is not a manufacturer in the United States, capable of understanding the measure, who has any real fear that the passage of the Mills bill would harm any American protected industry or deprive them of the full measure of protection afforded by a revenue tariff necessary to make up and go 10 per cent. over the difference in the cost of American and European labor.

But the source of all the trouble is that while they know the Mills bill is harmless in itself and if anything an improvement of the present protective system, yet the apprehension remains that the Mills bill, like the pending treaty, is "but the initiatory step towards the complete surrender of the markets of the United States." All this sheet-iron thunder, all this ringing of gongs and fire-bells, and the outcry that the fires of free trade are approaching the palaces of protection will fail to rally the occupants of the cabins, shanties, and tenement houses to the rescue. We are now brought face to face with the treaty of 1818 and must take the responsibility of accepting or rejecting its plain meaning and obeying or disregarding its obligations.

The first part of Article I of the treaty of 1818 provides that—

The inhabitants of the United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Romean Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice to the rights of the Hudson Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coasts of Newfoundland above described, and of the coast of Labrador (subject to the right of new settlers thereon to object to drying and curing, etc).

That part of the treaty of 1818, quoted above, describes the waters in which American fishermen are to enjoy forever the right to catch fish, and also the places where they can dry and cure fish.

It will be seen that in describing the waters and their boundaries by coasts and bays and harbors nothing is said about any 3-miles line or limitation on any coast, bay, or harbor in which the right to catch fish and dry and cure fish is granted or acknowledged.

In the last part of Article I comes the memorable renunciation clause—that is, the clause in which the right of American fishermen to catch fish, and dry and cure fish, in certain waters is forever renounced, given up, and excluded, and the following is its language:

And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominion in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

If the language of the above renunciation clause were used in a contract, what would the parties to it be understood as intending and meaning? And, if the parties who used the language could not agree as to its meaning, what would any court, judge, or chancellor decide, if required to do so by the parties to the agreement? In the first place, it seems clear that the right to catch fish in the waters that are made common by the treaty of 1818 to Americans and Canadians is not restricted by any 3-mile limit from the shore of any bay or harbor or from the open seacoast of these British provinces. The 3-mile limitation was certainly in the mind of the parties to the treaty, as it was applied to the shores of bays and harbors from which the right of American fishermen to catch, dry, and cure fish was expressly renounced and excluded. And on every rule of construction the use of the 3-mile limit as to one place and not as to another confines the limitation to the place mentioned.

Next, as to the delimitation of the bays and harbors in which the right to take, dry, and cure fish is given up forever by American fishermen. In other words, what are the Canadian waters in which our fishermen can not fish, dry, or cure fish?

The 3-mile line out into the open sea along the coasts, where the renounced bays and harbors are found, and as they are named on the map, does not seem to have been subject to dispute. But when the 3-mile line along the open seacoast came to the mouth of a bay or harbor that is not over 6 miles wide, it had to run across the mouth of the bay or harbor 3 miles out into the open sea, leaving the bay or harbor closed to American fisherman, for the reason that if the 3-mile line were to be run into the bay 3 miles from the first headland of the mouth, when the line came out of the bay into the ocean 3 miles from the other headland of the mouth it would come in contact with the first line at the entrance and leave no sea margin. So that it was plain that the 3 marine miles mentioned in the renunciation clause of the treaty of 1818 excluded American fishermen from all bays and harbors in Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland that are not over 6 miles wide at their entrance from the ocean.

Then came the bays and harbors that were over 6 marine miles wide at their mouth and not included in the waters made common to fishermen by the first paragraph of the treaty of 1818. The British contention has been that American fishing vessels had no right to take, dry, or cure fish in any bay or harbor, except those within the limits expressly defined in said first paragraph; that the renunciation clause in the treaty covered all the waters "not included within the above-mentioned limits." Against this British construction of the treaty of 1818 it has been claimed, and is now claimed, that bays over 6 miles wide at their mouth are not Canadian bays within the meaning of the treaty, and are, therefore, not bays from which American fishermen are excluded by the treaty.

The diplomatic correspondence upon these conflicting claims as to bays over 6 miles wide at their mouth, founded on privileges enjoyed by us when we were colonial subjects of Great Britain, has evolved a large amount of curious and interesting opinion and argument. The most exhaustive, conclusive, and luminous argument ever made on that subject I read on yesterday from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I have no desire to enter this field, as it has been often explored by those scholarly gentleman who are fond of antediluvian literature, and is useful only to show how great men have differed, and have left their differences to time for final solution. Time has brought into existence new circumstances, conditions, and relations, and under their influence we shall be compelled to surrender on both sides some of our contentions and to confront each other squarely and fairly on the practical grounds upon which there is an honest difference between the two governments.

It appears to me that in relation to bays that are over 6 miles wide and not within the limits of common fishing grounds defined in the treaty of 1818, both governments must accept the conclusion that the 3 marine mile line, the national common law jurisdictional line on the ocean coast, when it comes to these bays must enter them from the ocean 3 miles from the first headland at the mouth, and run all round the bay 3 miles from the inland bay shore, and out again into the ocean 3 miles from the second headland, leaving the waters of the bay outside of the 3-mile line from the bay shore an open bay. Within the 3-mile line inside of the bay no American fishermen can catch, dry, or cure fish. Can American fishermen catch fish within the open bay outside the 3-mile limit from the bay shore where the bay is over 6 miles wide? Upon this question it is clear to my mind that the treaty of 1818 has no application or effect.

I am persuaded that the treaty of 1818 applies only to waters inside of bays less than 6 miles wide at their mouth, and to the waters next to the shores of bays over 6 miles wide and 3 miles from the inside bay shore. As to the waters of the open bay outside of the 3-mile line from the bay shore, fishery rights and privileges depend upon the territorial jurisdiction of the government whose territory surrounds the bay on all sides. I understand that some Republican Senators concede that over bays that are more than 6 miles wide and surrounded by the territory of the British provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, these provincial governments have rightful jurisdiction. But they deny that in the excercise of this jurisdiction there is any power in these provincial governments to interfere with the right of American fishermen to catch fish in the waters of a bay that is over 6 miles wide and 3 miles from the inside bay shore.

I am troubled to understand how fishery rights of American citizens can coexist in harmony with territorial jurisdiction of the Dominion government of Canada in the bays that are over 6 miles wide at their mouth. What law in existence in the bay created American fishery rights and sustains them there against the territorial jurisdiction of Canada? Upon what law does American fishery rights stand independently of Canadian territorial jurisdiction over bays that are wider than 6 miles at their entrance? Is it natural law or international law? If either of these laws, then the same law would give to Canadians or any other foreigners fishery rights in Long Island Sound, Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, and American fishing waters on the Pacific coast. This question of territorial jurisdiction over fisheries in bays and sounds is of far-reaching importance to the United States.

The Government of the United States can never recognize the doctrine that the right to catch fish in our bays and sounds can be exercised by foreigners in defiance of the jurisdiction, State and Federal, of the United States. The assumption that fishery rights of foreigners in the bays and sounds of the United States can exist and be exercised against our jurisdiction over these bays and sounds is illogical, unsound, and against the decisions of our highest courts, State and Federal. The majority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on page 5, uses the following language on this question of territorial jurisdiction over Canadian waters:

> The right of the British to exclude such vessels (fishing vessels) and all others of the United States from her ports in British North America, as the matter stood until 1830, is fully conceded; and it is also conceded that during that time the only right of any vessel of the United States to enter the waters of British North America depended upon the treaty of 1818 alone.

The Government of the United States is fully committed time and again, by treaty and otherwise, to the rightful jurisdiction of Great Britain and the local governments of her provinces over the waters of the bays in question. Then comes the inquiry, has the conceded jurisdiction of Great Britain over these provincial bays or waters ever been exercised in favor of conferring upon American fishing vessels the right to catch fish in Canadian bays that are over 6 miles wide at their mouth?

It is claimed in the majority report of the Senate committee, and by all the opponents of the pending treaty, that the act of Congress, and the proclamation of President Jackson, and the British order in Council in 1830, created reciprocal trade relations between the two countries which are now existing and binding on both governments. Those who make this claim insist that the scope and legal effect of the act of 1830 and the proclamation to enforce it are co-extensive in their operation over bays that are less than 6 miles wide at their mouth and embraced in the renunciation clause of the treaty of 1818, so as to confer commercial rights on American fishing vessels that enter the renounced bays with permits to trade in Canadian ports.

It is also claimed that this reciprocal act of 1830 operates and confers commercial rights on American fishing vessels in Canadian bays that are over 6 miles wide at their mouth and not covered by the renunciation clause of the treaty of 1818. In other words, that when American fishing vessels have a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or place in the British Dominion of North America, they have the same right or privilege to enter such port or place, whether under or over 6 miles wide at its mouth, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nations. That is, that the United States, under the act of 1830, can give to one and the same vessel by a simple permit the double character of a fishing vessel and a trading vessel, with the same commercial rights and privileges in all Canadian waters, bays, ports, and places, whether renounced or not, in the treaty of 1818.

It is in this claim of right in American fishing vessels under the act of 1830 that is found the source and exciting cause of all the contention between the two governments in relation to the rights of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters. What, then, is the reciprocal act of 1830, fairly construed? In 1830 the United States, and especially New England, were anxious that Great Britain should—> open the ports of her colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama Islands and Bermuda Islands to the vessels of the United States, and especially those of Maine and Massachusetts, for an indefinite or for a limited term; and that the vessels of the United States, and especially those from New England, and their cargoes, on entering the colonial ports aforesaid, shall not be subject to other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, or charges of any other description, than would be imposed on British vessels or their cargoes arriving in the said colonial vessels from the United States; that the vessels of the United States, and especially those from New England, may import into the said colonial possessions from the United States any article or articles which could be imported in a British vessel into the said possessions from the United States, and that the vessels of the United States, and especially those from New England, may export from the British colonies aforesaid, to any country whatever, other than the dominions or possessions of Great Britain, any article or articles that can be exported therefrom in a British vessel, to any country other than the British dominions aforesaid, leaving the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other ports of the British dominions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is?

It thus appears from the act of 1830 and the proclamation of President Jackson in pursuance of it that the only ports in which the United States asked or desired commercial intercourse and commercial rights and privileges for American vessels were the ports of the West Indies, the Bahama Islands, and the Islands of Bermuda. Not one word is in the act of 1830 or the proclamation of President Jackson that expresses any intention, expectation, or desire that any merchant vessel or fishing vessel of the United States should have any right or privilege under any permit or otherwise to enter, touch, or trade in any port or bay of Canada, Nova Scotia, or Newfoundland. On the contrary the Government of the United States asked nothing more than the act and proclamation recited, and for the rights thus specified and asked of the British Government for American vessels in the ports of the West Indies and the Bahama and Bermuda Islands the Government of the United States voluntarily offered to Great Britain that—> the ports of the United States shall be opened indefinitely, or for a term fixed, as the case may be, to British vessels coming from the said British colonial possessions and their cargoes—

On the same terms applicable to vessels of the United States in the ports of the West Indies, etc., and the Government of the United States in the act of 1830, and the President in his proclamation, also offered to British vessels—> coming from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and North or East of the United States—

The same rights and privileges in the ports of the United States that had been offered to the British vessels coming from ports in the West Indies and the Bermuda and Bahama Islands.

The United States, and especially New England, were so anxious to secure reciprocal trade with the West Indies and the Bermuda and Bahama Islands, in order to get cheap molasses free from duty for rum-making, that the offer was made to Great Britain in 1830 that if the vessels of the United States, and especially of New England, were allowed to trade with the West Indies and the Bermuda and Bahama Islands on the terms recited in the act, then British vessels from the West Indies and from Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland might enter on the same terms any American port. How, then, can the United States, and especially New England, now claim under the reciprocal act of 1830 what they intentionally omitted from the act when it was framed? The sum total of the reciprocity asked was that the United States vessels got the right to enter and trade in the ports of the West Indies and the Bermuda and Bahama Islands, and for that consideration alone British vessels from the West Indies and the Bahama and Bermuda Islands, and also from Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, got the right to enter and trade in the ports of the United States.

Nothing can be found in the act of 1830 or the proclamation of President Jackson showing that there was any intention or purpose or desire to have conferred upon American fishing vessels any fishery or commercial rights or privileges in addition to the rights and privileges conferred or reserved in the renunciation clause of the treaty of 1818 in the renounced bays.

Then, as to bays over 6 miles wide at their mouth and not affected by the treaty of 1818, the question of fishery rights and commercial rights of American fishing vessels and American merchant vessels are subject to the territorial jurisdiction of the government having control and jurisdiction over the territory which surrounds these bays to the same extent that the sounds and bays surrounded by territory in the United States are subject to the jurisdiction of our State and Federal governments.

The contention of the majority report is that the language of the British order in council descriptive of the vessels having the right to enter ports in British possessions would include fishing as well as merchant vessels. There is nothing in the negotiation and nothing in the character of the subject or object of the negotiation resulting in the reciprocal arrangement of 1830 to show that fishery rights, fish, or fishing vessels of the United States were ever mentioned, considered, or thought of in that transaction.

The treaty of 1818, relating alone to fish and fishery rights of American fishing vessels and fishermen, was in full operation and was the only arrangement desired by the United States with Great Britain about fish and fishery rights of American vessels in the ports of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland. In the face of the fishery treaty of 1818, that had been in operation twelve years, is it not most remarkable that if the commercial or trading rights now claimed for American fishing vessels in Canadian bays, in addition to the rights renounced and reserved in the treaty of 1818, had been or were intended to be one of the subjects or objects of the arrangement of 1830, something would have been said or some allusion made to fishing vessels and their commercial rights in Canadian bays in the act of 1830 and the proclamation of President Jackson?

It is admitted in the majority report that American fishing vessels had no fishery rights or commercial rights in Canadian ports except those reserved in the renunciation clause of the treaty of 1818, and if the reciprocal arrangement of 1830 were intended to embrace fishing vessels, and to superadd commercial rights to their treaty rights by a Congressional act, why was the act specific as to the scope of its operation alone in the West Indies and in the Bahama and Bermuda Islands, and entirely silent as to fishery rights or commercial rights of fishing or merchant vessels in the bays of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland?

The proclamation of President Jackson was responsive to the act and also silent as the grave about commercial or any other rights of American vessels in the ports of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland. But the sole foundation of the late pretense or afterthought that American fishing vessels had been turned into merchant vessels and made double-headed in Canadian waters by the reciprocal arrangement of 1830 is the following language in the British order in council:

> That the ships of and belonging to the United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid into the British possessions abroad goods the produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad to be carried to any foreign country whatever.

On the above language the majority report remarks:

> It is clear that under this act of Congress all British vessels, without regard to their occupation, whether fishing or other, coming from British North America, were entitled to admission into our ports for all purposes of trade and commerce. Canadian fishing vessels had the same rights as any other, for they fell within the general description stated in the statute. So, too, reciprocally, our fishing vessels fell within the general description of "ships of and belonging to the United States." Before this time all American vessels were excluded from British North American ports; then, under this arrangement, all ships of the United States were to be admitted into British North American ports. The former almost universal exclusion was abolished without reserve.

Mark the following language of the majority report in continuation of the above quotation:

> If any literal reading of this British order in council can be suggested as of a narrower construction, it would destroy the mutuality of the action of the two governments and be unworthy of a government. Surely no nation not in a state of vassalage would consent that its citizens or subjects should for a moment be treated in or by another nation in a less favorable way than it treated the citizens or subjects of the same class and occupation of such other nation.

How can the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee use the above language in the face of the undisputed fact within their knowledge that the Government of the United States in defining what it claimed for vessels of and belonging to the United States in British ports expressly limited and confined its claim to the right of entering and trading in the British ports in the West Indies and the Bahama and Bermuda Islands? Not one word is in the act of Congress, or in the proclamation of the President, indicating that the United States intended, expected, or desired that it should be a part of the mutuality or reciprocity arranged in 1830 between the two governments that American fishing vessels, whose rights had been the subject of treaty stipulations in 1818, should have commercial rights and privileges superadded thereto in Canadian waters.

The United States have received everything which they demanded in the act of 1830, and more than they demanded, in British ports, and Great Britain has received no more for her vessels in American ports than what was voluntarily offered by the United States in the reciprocal arrangement in 1830. I am unable to understand how we can, under the influence of partisan considerations, so far disregard or pervert our treaty obligations as to assume or demand that when our fishing vessels enter the renounced bays in Canadian dominions with a permit to trade, they have the right to buy bait, provisions, seines, hooks and lines, and employ new crews to carry on their fishing business in the deep seas and on the great banks, and do everything—except fish and cure and dry fish—that can be done by a merchant vessel.

We may appeal to the self-interest of American fishermen and stir the latent prejudices against British greed, but we can not escape from our own conscientious convictions and the moral sense of the world as to the scope and meaning of the reciprocal arrangement in 1830. We made a treaty in 1854 and in 1871 in relation to fishery rights of American and Canadian fishing vessels and fishermen, and never pretended that they had the rights and privileges now claimed for them under the reciprocal act of 1830. There is no dispute about commercial rights of American merchant vessels in any British port. The controversy is about the commercial rights of American fishing vessels under the act of 1830 when they enter Canadian bays less than 6 miles wide with trade permits.

I have often asked the question, what is the real value of the commercial rights thus claimed for our fishing vessels in Canadian waters? Is the right to buy bait worth all this contention? The testimony of fishermen is that fishing with bait has been pretty much abandoned for seine fishing in the deep seas. Is it to supply themselves with provisions or seines for use in carrying on their fishing on the great "banks," or is it to ship new and cheaper crews? If all or any of these rights are useful or valuable or necessary as fishing rights, which the Gloucester fishermen deny, why were they not expressly reserved in the treaty of 1818 with the other specified rights to enter Canadian bays for "shelter, repairs, wood, and water?"

It is a fact that when the treaty of 1818 was being framed the United States asked that the right to buy bait should be named in the treaty and it was refused. The treaty of 1818 specifies what rights are reserved to American fishing vessels in the renounced Canadian bays, and not being satisfied with the rights reserved to enter these bays for shelter, repairs, wood, and water, the treaty guards against any attempt to add to them by construction by using the following words of exclusion: "And for no other purpose whatever."

Mr. President, having disposed of the contention of the opponents of the pending treaty, "that the existing matters of difficulty are not subjects for treaty negotiation," as they are already clearly adjusted by the treaty of 1818 and the reciprocal act of 1830, I will proceed to inquire what the two Governments have concluded to offer each other in the exercise of their conceded jurisdiction over the subjects under consideration. What is the difference, if any, between what is claimed as being already secured and what is proposed in the pending treaty by way of an adjustment of important differences?

1. The first point of dispute dealt with in the proposed treaty is the designation or marking the boundaries or outlines of—> the waters, bays, creeks, and harbors of the coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland, as to which the United States, by Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, renounced forever any liberty to take, dry, or cure fish.

The new treaty proposes that this dispute shall be settled as follows:

> The 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I shall be measured seaward from low-water mark; but that every bay, creek, or harbor not otherwise provided for in the treaty, such 3 marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek, or harbor in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed 10 marine miles.

This provision covers only the area of renounced fishing waters. It must be admitted that as this matter now stands the renounced bays, creeks and harbors are only 6 miles wide at their entrance, and the proposed treaty includes as renounced bays, creeks, and harbors under the treaty of 1818 all those that are not over 10 miles wide at their entrance. Why does the proposed treaty make this change from 6 miles to 10 miles in the width of the outlets of bays into the ocean? It is known that the 3-mile line from the seashore out into the ocean was drawn that distance to put the seashore out of the range of cannon-shot, and the distance was increased to 5 miles on account of the modern improvements in the implements of warfare. The majority report makes the surprisingly liberal concession or suggestion that this increased range of cannon-shot "may make it politic for maritime nations to agree upon an enlargement of the boundaries of their territorial dominion seaward," but protests against this surrender of 4 miles in the width of bays that are to be renounced, when the treaty of 1818 plainly makes the width of these bays only 6 instead of 10 miles across the entrance. Great Britain also protested against Secretary Bayard's offer to make the bay mouth 10 miles. But the proposed delimitation of renounced bays, in any reasonable view that can be taken of its real effect, is, in my judgment, undeserving of serious resistance or consideration.

2. The proposed treaty next disposes of the dispute as to some bays that are over, and some bays that are under 6 miles wide at their mouths. It must not be forgotten that, according to British contention as to the renunciation of fishery rights in the treaty of 1818, the 3-mile line was never to run into any British bay, however wide at the mouth; but under the claim of the United States our fishing vessels were only excluded from the bays less than 6 miles wide. In my judgment, this difference between the friends and opponents of the pending treaty is practically immaterial under my view, herein presented, as to territorial waters and territorial jurisdiction.

The fourth article of the pending treaty names eleven bays, some over and some under 6 miles wide at their mouth, in which the limits of exclusion in the enjoyment of fishery rights are expressly defined; and taking these delimitations, including the 10 miles enlargement of bay mouths, and the bays over 10 miles wide mentioned in the fourth article, and how is the account of profit and loss under the proposed settlement to be stated?

The total area of fishing waters in bays not more than 6 miles wide is about 6,600 square miles. The 3-mile line in bays over 6 miles wide would exclude our fishermen from an additional area of about 3,489 square miles, making the aggregate of 10,089 square miles in which our fishermen had renounced the common right of fishing according to British construction. In fact the total area of fishing waters given up under the proposed treaty is only 1,127 square miles.

The 3,489 square miles of fishing waters in open bays over 6 miles wide at their mouth, and over which the United States are committed to the existence of British and Canadian jurisdiction, as fully as we claim it over our own bays and sounds, are made common fishing waters by the pending treaty. Great Britain yields more than two-thirds of her waters from which we have admitted her right to exclude us, and we yield only one-third of fishing waters we claim the common right to enjoy with Canadian fishermen.

Mr. President, I am unable to understand how it can be claimed that there is any fishery right of American fishermen in Canadian waters that requires any more recognition, security, or protection than they are conceded to have and entitled to enjoy under the pending treaty. And as to the claim of commercial rights for our fishing vessels under the reciprocal act and proclamation and order in council in 1830, I am constrained to deny that such claim has any just foundation in the reciprocal arrangement of 1830. If such commercial rights of fishing vessels are ever to be recognized it must be done hereafter on international comity, and it is on that basis alone, whatever commercial privileges our fishing vessels are permitted to enjoy in Canadian ports, in addition to those rights reserved to them in the renounced bays covered by the treaty of 1818, must rest if the pending treaty is rejected.

If the rights and privileges claimed to be valuable to our fishing vessels in Canadian bays depend on international comity, then it follows that they can not be enjoyed or enforced except by the consent of the British Government. Whatever governments concede to each other on international comity is a matter absolutely and solely within their discretion, which they are free to exercise in their own way, and to shoulder the responsibility and the consequences. The President and Her Majesty have agreed upon a treaty which is claimed by them to be a fair adjustment of the matters in dispute about fishery rights and privileges of American and Canadian fishermen and their vessels, and the treaty is now before the Senate for consideration.

The first question is, will two-thirds of the Senate accept the treaty as it is? If no, then the next question is, will a majority amend the treaty by striking out any part of it that two-thirds will not approve, and inserting something that a majority supports, and in this way assist and advise and consult with the President, so as to get a better settlement if practicable. If the majority of the Senate refuse to make any effort to amend and improve the treaty, it is unquestionably the determination of the majority to compel the President to inaugurate non-intercourse along the whole lake and Atlantic shores and to maintain that non-intercourse with the people of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland until the demands of Republican Senators are yielded to the fishermen of Maine and Massachusetts by Her Majesty's Government.

The Republican majority of this Senate seem to have become distracted in their desperate search for some issue with the President, and are so crazed by disappointment in the wild hunt for office and power to be exercised, as heretofore, to perpetuate over-taxation, to satiate the greed of monopoly, that they seem lost to all sense of propriety and constitutional obligation in passing upon the pending treaty, and taking their part, known to be greater than the President's, in treaty-making. The President has discharged his duty with due care for the rights of our fishermen and free from any partisan ends or considerations, and it is for the people to decide whether the President or the Senate is most to blame for keeping up this disturbing contention that is so full of ruinous consequences.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the people of the West and South need not believe that the people of New England wish unnecessarily to prolong controversy between the United States and Canada concerning the rights and privileges of American fishing vessels, or are unwilling that a fair adjustment should be effected through appropriate methods. On the contrary they earnestly desire the speediest possible settlement that will reasonably protect the interest involved and maintain national dignity and honor in intercourse with Great Britain. The protection of that interest is required only by a section; the maintenance of national dignity and honor is demanded by the whole people.

A fair summary of the changes to be effected by the proposed treaty of February 15, 1888, is as follows:

1. After the rights of American fishermen, which were amply secured by the treaty of 1783, had been reduced by the treaty of 1818, they yet had the right to take fish in all the waters of Canada outside of 3 miles from the indented shore line of the various coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors; and to enter such bays or harbors for shelter, repairs, wood, or water. By the pending treaty, under a delimitation process, they are to be totally excluded from taking fish in certain specified bays which they have been wont to frequent, and across the mouth of every bay not more than 10 miles wide a straight line is to be drawn and from that the 3-mile line of exclusion is to be measured seaward. (Articles III and IV.)

Under this delimitation process substantially everything is given up by the United States; nothing valuable is received. No reasonable excuse is given for the enlargement of the exclusion from 6 miles across bays to 10 miles, except that Canada has in the past argued that she had the right to draw a line of exclusion across the headlands of bays. But it clearly appears that the headland theory has always been a technical and unsubstantial pretense; has never been seriously asserted; has always been scouted by the United States, and was decided against by an umpire in the only cases in which it was ever formally promulgated. It is sufficient to quote what Sir Charles Tupper said of this claim April 10, 1888, in the Canadian Parliament. He termed it a right "technically claimed but practically abandoned for forty years."

In making such a headland pretense a reason for retiring our fishermen from 10-mile bays when they have always entered 6-mile bays, the Administration proceeds upon the principle which it has been said in New Hampshire has usually governed the decisions of one of our most distinguished citizens, George W. Nesmith, of Franklin, a bosom friend of Daniel Webster, a magistrate for sixty-five years, now living in his eighty-eighth year, hale and hearty. Although a lawyer, he has not been litigious but always a peace-maker, and has been a referee in more controversies than any other citizen. It is said that a visitor to our State, riding through Franklin, expressed to the stage-driver great admiration for a beautiful farm and said he would much like to own it. The driver said, "I do not know how you can get the whole of it, but I can tell you how you can certainly get half of it. Stop here and bring a lawsuit against the owner for the whole, have the case referred to Judge Nesmith and he will award you one-half." The Secretary of State, on a recent visit to Dartmouth College, made the acquaintance of Judge Nesmith, and doubtless learned from him his principle of decision. But he has enlarged it in the delimitations in this treaty, for, instead of giving Canada half that she claimed without any right, he has given her nearly the whole.

2. The treaty provides, in Article X, that American fishing vessels entering Canadian bays or harbors for repairs, shelter, wood, or water shall be exempt from pilotage and harbor dues, and need not formally report at the custom-houses, except twenty-four hours after entering established ports.

The exemptions thus grudgingly granted to distressed vessels are slight favors, and could not be refused to any vessels according to the law of nations without resort to any treaty, as is clearly shown in Mr. Bayard's letter to Mr. Phelps of November 6, 1886.

3. If the treaty is confirmed, by Article XI American fishermen are to receive certain hospitable treatment which none but barbarous nations refuse to vessels on their coasts. If driven in by stress of weather and compelled to repair, they may, if it be necessary to the repairs, unload, reload, transship, or sell their fish; and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of sickness or death may be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews, and in all cases may have provisions and supplies for homeward voyages.

The privileges given by this article to fishing vessels only when they are in distress are properly termed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] "rights of hospitality." The London Times of February 23, 1888, says the treaty resolves itself "chiefly into a liberal extension of what may be called the humane provisos of the convention" of 1818, the American renunciation in which "was subject to certain exceptions dictated by humanity."

While we can afford to accept such exemption from barbarous treatment if freely granted by the Canadians without price, we can not afford to purchase it by the humiliations imposed upon us by this treaty.

4. There shall be a "conspicuous exhibition by every United States fishing vessel of its official number on each bow." (Article XIII.)

This is a petty humiliation, will be irritating to all Americans, and is of slight importance to the Canadian authorities.

5. Canadian penalties for unlawful fishing by American fishing vessels within forbidden waters may extend to the forfeiture of vessels and supplies and cargoes; while for other offenses against Canadian law penalties may be imposed not to exceed $3 for every ton of the vessel. Trials are to be summary and inexpensive at the place of detention unless a change is made for the convenience of the defendant. Reasonable bail is to be taken, and there is to be no appeal, except for the defense; and judgments are, before execution, to be reviewed by the superior Canadian authorities. (Article XIV.)

These stipulations against oppressive methods of criminal prosecution of our fishermen and their vessels are either too many or too few. It ought not to be necessary for us to attempt by treaty to secure for Americans actually offending against just laws exemption from the methods of trial prescribed by those laws; while if we really propose to protect by treaty our citizens and their property against the harsh and oppressive Canadian statutes enacted to harass us into opening our markets to Canadian producers, it will be necessary to go much further than does this Article XIV.

It expresses and recognizes the right of Canadian courts to forfeit our ships, cargoes, and supplies without adequately defining the offenses of "unlawfully fishing" and "preparing to unlawfully fish," or properly limiting the penalties which may be imposed. Canada is left free to declare any act unlawful not expressly allowed by the treaty. In addition to forfeitures she may fine and imprison the officers and crew. They can not appeal to London, to the Privy Council, nor to the Queen. The proceedings are to be summary, and the President can not interfere by diplomatic representation. The treaty fails to stipulate that intention or guilty knowledge must exist to constitute the offense, and the fisherman may be punished if he is the tenth of a mile or one foot, and that unwillingly, out of his intended course. Our own revenue and fishing laws carefully provide for remissions of penalties when there is no intention to do wrong and no guilty knowledge.

This treaty, if it entered this field of stipulation at all, should have expressly provided that the governor-general should have power to remit all penalties and to pardon all offenders, if satisfied that the offenses were committed without guilty knowledge on the part of those found fishing in forbidden waters. There is no provision that those seizing a vessel shall be punished by damages if it shall appear that there was no probable cause for the seizure. There is not even a stipulation that the accused Americans shall be tried only in a court of record. The article, while ingeniously framed to appear to grant exemption to our fishermen, expressly delivers them and their property into the hands of a cruel code and an unrelenting enemy. No New Englander will be willing to impose this crime-creating article upon the New England fishermen.

6. Whenever the United States shall remove its duties on fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and all fish (except those preserved in oil) coming from Canada, then United States fishing vessels shall have licenses to enter Canadian ports in order to purchase provisions, bait, and other supplies and outfits, to transship their catch by any means, and to ship crews; and they may obtain bait by barter, but not supplies in that mode. (Article XV.)

The restricted commercial privileges thus to be paid for by free fish and fish-oils our vessels are now fairly entitled to, in return for similar privileges freely enjoyed by Canadian vessels in American ports; and our fishermen are specially secured their right to transship their catch by the nineteenth article of the treaty of Washington.

This then is the arrangement, our confirmation of which is asked: The President dangerously enlarges the area of the waters from which our fishing vessels are to be excluded, or in which they are to be entrapped; in return, he obtains an agreement from England that such vessels while entering Canadian bays or harbors for repairs, shelter, wood, or water shall not be forced to make formal entry at custom-houses if it is impracticable to do so; that when they are shipwrecked or in perils of ocean, they shall not be brutally treated; that when they are seized for alleged offenses justice shall not be oppressively perverted to forfeit them, and the President also obtains a promise for such vessels of limited commercial rights in Canadian ports, to be performed only when Congress will so alter our tariff laws as to admit Canadian fish and fish-oils free of duty. Is such a treaty beneficial and satisfactory to the fishing interests, and if not ought it to be forced upon them? This is perhaps a comparatively small question. Is such a treaty with all its circumstances one befitting our character as a free and independent nation? This is possibly a large question.

That the treaty is not beneficial to the fishermen does not need lengthy demonstration. It surrenders access to waters which are valuable to them; it belittles and humiliates and endangers them; it gives them barely exemption from barbarous treatment and only promises them important and reasonable commercial facilities on condition that their home market for fish shall be opened to the competition of their Canadian rivals. The voices of the fishermen are unanimously against this one-sided bargain. They believe they are entitled to full commercial rights, and they wish the Government to take a firm stand in demanding them.

They do not wish to put great white figures on their bows, to pay in any way for licenses to buy bait and supplies, or to carry on their business under a ban with fewer rights than other commercial ships after having been in the early days of the Republic specially favored of all vessels on the sea. But the fishermen long for peace, and it may be that if they realize that they are to be neglected or sacrificed by their Government and to receive only the rights of an inferior class, their courage will at last fail them, and they will give up their unequal struggle against Canada, Great Britain, and their own Government. Such is evidently the hope of the administration which has sacrificed their interests.

The treaty is dishonoring to the nation in many points:

1. It is a national dishonor, because it has been negotiated after a series of wrongful seizures and other outrages perpetrated upon American fishing vessels for the very purpose of forcing upon us a disadvantageous bargain, and yet it does not include any acknowledgment of the wrongs done or provide reparation therefor. The long catalogue of unjustifiable assaults upon American rights has been often proclaimed to the world. The oppressions seem to have been purposely intended to be offensive to American honor. The flag of the Union has been hauled down on the deck of an American vessel by a British captain for the apparent purpose of degradation and insult.

The intent of Canada's whole course has been apparent from the beginning, to harass us into a new treaty of some sort. Therefore, no treaty should have been made as long as the outrages were continued, and the very first article of a treaty should have provided apology and ample reparation for the wrongs done. And yet no allusion to these occurrences is made in the treaty or in the President's accompanying letter; and the claims for damages for seizures and wrongs which were once valiantly presented are now at last left unadjusted and unnoticed. No independent nation should stoop to make a treaty under such circumstances and with such an omission.

2. The treaty is a national dishonor, because by it we are forced by Canada towards alterations in our customs duties desired by her. She wishes reciprocity treaties opening our markets to her products. We have declined so to open them. She begins to harass us on subjects not connected with customs duties, and we yield and negotiate a treaty looking to changes in those duties. This is degradation. A reciprocity treaty may be honorably made, each side giving what are natural and customary equivalents. But a treaty by which we change our customs duties and Canada gives no natural equivalent which we can honorably accept as such is not friendly reciprocity, but on our part a pusillanimous surrender.

We claim full commercial rights for our vessels in Canadian ports without regard to customs duties imposed by either country. She offers to give to those ships limited commercial rights on condition that we will remove our duties on fish, and we are asked to make that bargain. We can not afford to do it. The equivalent for commercial rights for our vessels in British ports is the similar rights now accorded their vessels in our ports. Thus let both stand or fall. Commercial rights for our ships, which we persistently claim and to which we believe we are entitled in return for like privileges given British ships, we can not safely purchase by alterations in our tariff. If we do, what shall we ask of Great Britain as an equivalent for the commercial rights of her vessels? It can not be too much emphasized that the whole controversy with Canada proceeds from her determination to reach our markets at reduced rates of duty or with duties removed. It is national injury, dishonor, and degradation to allow Canada, backed by Great Britain, to compel us in such ways as are proposed to alter our customs duties.

3. The treaty is a national dishonor because it is a part of a negotiation conducted by the representatives of England, not alone with the United States Government, but, avowedly, with one political party in this country.

When in 1885 Minister West first enticed Mr. Bayard into an unlawful agreement to extend the fishing articles of the treaty of Washington for six months and to ask Congress to submit the fishery question to another joint commission, and public outcry against this arrangement was made in behalf of the fishermen, Mr. West declared that of course a majority of the Republican Senate would assail any arrangement made by the Cleveland administration. Mr. Chamberlain has also been free in thinly veiled assaults upon the Republican party, and Mr. Bayard has followed in his wake, while Sir Charles Tupper discloses the whole purpose of the treaty negotiation to make an alliance with the Democratic party and through the agency of that party to secure the reduction or removal of customs duties and free trade for Canadian producers in our markets.

In his speech of April 10, 1888, Sir Charles Tupper first finds an identity of policy between Canada and the Democratic party of this country. He says:

Mr. Bayard states now and has stated throughout his great desire to have the freest commercial intercourse between us consistent with the position and interest of the two countries. He says if we want to see the policy of the Government of the United States you have it in the President's message to Congress; there is our policy. * * * I say, sir, after studying the policy of the United States, of the Democratic party * * * after reading the President's message, after reading the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, after reading the speech of Mr. CARLISLE, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on taking the chair, I have come to the conclusion that their policy is just as close to the policy of the government of Canada as any two things can be.

Next, Sir Charles proceeds to utter libels upon the Republican party, saying:

I need not tell the House that one of the advantages we enjoy under British institutions is that we are saved from the extreme and violent antagonisms of party that every fourth year the Presidential election brings about in the United States. Now, any man who knows anything of the politics of the United States knows that however good a measure is, however valuable, however much it commends itself to the judgment of every intelligent statesman in that country, it is a matter almost of honor on the part of the party in opposition to prevent the government of the day from doing anything that would give them any credit or strengthen their hands in the country; that on the eve of a Presidential election it is next to impossible to induce a Republican majority in the Senate to sanction anything that a Democratic administration has carried through, however valuable that may be.

In another breath, however, Sir Charles appeals to the Republican party after this foolish fashion:

Let the Senate of the United States to-morrow reject this treaty. I trust they will not do so. I have a hope that there is independent statesmanship enough in the great Republican party of the United States, who have the power at their disposal to-day in the United States Senate, to allow that sentiment of patriotism to overweigh the party advantages they might hope to obtain by preventing the present Administration from settling this vexed question.

Apparently despairing, however, of the success of his appeal, he scolds a little and predicts the triumph of the Democratic party in the next election, thus:

Let a fisherman complain to-morrow of our interpretation of the treaty, of the enforcement of our most extreme construction of the treaty, the answer to him is this: Nobody is to blame for the inconvenience you suffer except the Senate of the United States. Your President, the Executive of your country, the Democratic party from end to end of the United States, declared it was a fair settlement. They represent an undoubted majority, in my judgment, of the people of the United States to-day, and I believe they will represent it to-morrow.

Having continued his Democratic allies in power, he tells how the Democratic party will slowly and securely give free trade with Canada. This is the way:

As I have said, Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us, that there was but one way of obtaining what we wished. You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse. You want relaxation in our tariff arrangements with respect to natural products in which you are so rich and abundant. There is but one way to obtain it. Let us by common concession be able to meet on common ground and remove this irritating cause of difficulty between the two countries out of the way, and you will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward march in the direction you propose and accomplish steadily that which you would desire in the only way by which it can ever be attained. Those were not empty words; they were the sober utterances of distinguished statesmen who pointed to the avowed policy of the Government of the United States as the best evidence of the sincerity of what they said.

What has happened already? Already we have action by the financial exponent of the Administration of the United States—I mean Mr. MILLS—the gentleman who in the United States Congress represents the Government of the day, and stands in the position most analogous in the United States to the finance minister in this House, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who propounds the policy of the Administration in the House. How is he selected? The Democratic party sustaining the Government selects a man as Speaker of the House of Representatives who is in accord with the policy of the Administration, and Mr. CARLISLE, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, nominates the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and all the members of the committee, and therefore the chairman of that committee occupies the position of representing the Government in bringing forward such bills as will represent the views and sentiments of the Democratic party of the United States supporting the Administration. What have we seen? The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he, as the representative of the Government, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means brings forward a measure to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Having thus shown that the Democratic party and Mr. CARLISLE and Mr. MILLS propose to give Canada this $1,800,000 for this treaty he shows that this was his great object in the negotiation. He says:

We have pledged ourselves to the people to do everything that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United States.

And, lastly, he says the Republican party is weak and that free trade is not far off. Mark the force of his words, friends of the Mills bill:

I say that under this bill which has been introduced, and which I believe will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate, where the Republican majority is only 1 in the whole House, to pass this bill, it requires a majority of 1 only, and I am very sanguine that this bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be but I am inclined to think that the amendments will be still more in the interests of Canada than as the bill stands to-day. If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On copper ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid * * * $96,945. On salt, $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill.

I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables not specially enumerated" will not exclude potatoes. In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, you do not expect any person who wants to carry a bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and, as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this bill of making those natural products of Canada free carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States of America. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 pounds of one kind, and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $193,892. Now, as I say, on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills bill amounts to no less than $1,800,198.

No further evidence can be needed to prove the truth of the assertion that the agents of Great Britain have opened negotiations with the Democratic party to obtain for Canadians alterations in our customs laws and free access to our markets; and to give these is the whole purpose and object of this British-Democratic alliance. It is a most shameful procedure; discreditable to all parties, British and American, engaged in it. Never before in the history of this country did emissaries of foreign governments openly engage in negotiations and alliances with one political party. Citizen Genet attempted, not an appeal to one party, but what he called an appeal to the people, and Washington sent him back to France.

Mr. Van Buren, when Secretary of State, had in letters to Mr. McLane, minister to England, claimed credit with that power because the administration of Jackson entertained more friendly sentiments towards English colonial pretensions than the previous administration of Adams; and later, when Mr. Van Buren was himself nominated for minister to England he was rejected by the Senate, because, as Mr. Webster said, his expressions were derogatory to the national character, showing a disposition in the writer to persuade Lord Aberdeen that the English Government had an interest in maintaining in the United States the ascendency of the political party to which Mr. Van Buren belonged, thus establishing abroad a distinction between his country and his party.

Equally disgraced in this unprecedented business are Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and Mr. Secretary Bayard. The American Senate ought to find a way to tell them that while our party strifes are bitter enough they shall not, without rebuke, be made the open basis of diplomatic negotiations.

4. The treaty is a national dishonor, because two of the so-called plenipotentiaries, being appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate, were not constitutionally selected.

By section 2, of Article II of the Constitution, the President is given power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. Without that consent (except temporarily in case of vacancies in offices previously established by law) he has no power to appoint officers of the United States to negotiate with foreign nations. But without the consent of the Senate and in defiance of the Constitution, Messrs. Angell and Putnam, two private citizens, were appointed plenipotentiaries to negotiate a fisheries treaty with Great Britain; and for months in Washington, directly in sight of Congress, they pursued their negotiations; and the wrong was the greater because the Senate had by a vote of 35 to 10 declared that no commission ought to be constituted for the negotiation of any treaty.

It can not be soundly contended that the power of the President in the first instance to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, to be submitted to the Senate, gives him the right without the consent of the Senate to appoint ambassadors or plenipotentiaries for any such negotiation. The public officers to whom he is in any case limited are those who have been or who specially may be appointed by the President and the Senate for such a duty. The President is not even expressly given the power to make preliminary negotiations without the consent of the Senate. The language of the Constitution (Article II, section 2) is as follows:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls * * * which shall be established by law.

Nothing could be more guarded and restrained than the President's power to make treaties and to appoint ministers for that purpose. In view of the Constitution, how can it fairly be contended that the President had any right to commission as foreign ministers and plenipotentiaries Messrs. Angell and Putnam? It plainly seems to be a gross violation of the Constitution, wilfully, recklessly, and defiantly perpetrated; and the Senate might well have refused on this ground even to consider the terms of a treaty thus first introduced into its presence.

The weakness of the position of the minority of the committee on this point is strikingly shown by the elaborate yet feeble attempt which they make in their report to justify to the Senate and the country the wrong which has been done.

No one has ever disputed the privilege of the President to negotiate treaties, using the Secretary of State and the regularly appointed and confirmed foreign ministers for that purpose. Why, then, do the minority particularize and parade about 438 cases of that character? Simply to obscure the flagrant nature of the case now under review and censure, and to break the force of the one great and overwhelming precedent against it, to be shortly stated. In addition to these 438 cases the report gives a list of three persons appointed by the Secretary of State and a list of thirty-two appointed by the President, and specially confirmed by the Senate to negotiate treaties. But of the three appointed by the Secretary of State, two, Hughes and Bates, were already diplomatic officers, and the thirty-two are of course all precedents against the minority and not in their favor.

There is to be extracted from the list of 473 only the following cases which are of any value to the minority, being those where private citizens were employed in negotiations without the prior consent of the Senate:

1. G. Morris, private agent, October 13, 1789, to ascertain the intentions of Great Britain as to the treaty of 1783, and making a treaty of commerce.

2. John James Appleton, May 12, 1825, to arrange for the settlement of claims of citizens of the United States against the Kingdom of Naples.

3. Charles Rhind, September 12, 1829, to conclude a treaty of friendship and commerce with Turkey.

4. Edmund Roberts, January 26, 1832, to conclude treaties of navigation and commerce with Cochin China, Siam, and Muscat.

5. A. Dudley Mann, March 28, 1846, to conclude with Hanover, Hungary, Switzerland, etc., treaties of commerce and navigation.

6. Benjamin E. Greene, June 13, 1849, to conclude treaties of commerce with Hayti and the Dominican Republic.

7. Isaac E. Morse, December 5, 1856, to conclude a treaty with New Granada with reference to transit across the Isthmus of Panama.

What a pitiful list among the whole 473 which are set out with such elaboration in the minority report! It is sufficient to say in relation to these 7, in the face of the overwhelming precedents the other way—the 466 cases where treaties have been negotiated by officials who had been confirmed by the Senate as required by the Constitution—that they are few in number, that the negotiations were insignificant, that the precedents were never acquiesced in, and that they constitute no real authority for or justification of the marked violation of the Constitution committed by the President in appointing Messrs. Angell and Putnam without the consent of the Senate.

I have stated that the object of the minority in cumbering their report with upward of 438 cases which have no bearing upon the point in controversy is simply to break the force of the one great and overwhelming precedent against them. It is impossible to resist this conclusion or a worse opinion upon the recorded facts.

On page 130 the minority give the case of the Joint High Commission which negotiated the Alabama Claims treaty, and they show Messrs. Ebenezer R. Hoar and George H. Williams as appointed while private citizens two of the five plenipotentiaries by the President alone; and the minority include the five in their number (on page 105) of 438 persons appointed by the President alone.

The minority, therefore, certainly thus appear to have found a pertinent precedent, especially as the High Joint Commission held its sessions, like the Bayard-Chamberlain commission, and with similar festivities, in the city of Washington. The only objection that can be made against this precedent is that the facts are directly the opposite of those stated in the minority report. Commissioners Hoar and Williams, as well as Secretary Fish, Minister Schenck, and Mr. Justice Nelson, were nominated to the Senate and were confirmed on the 10th day of February, 1871, before they acted.

It has doubtless been a deep humiliation for the learned and eloquent Senator who heads the minority report to conclude to advocate at the dictation of an imperious Secretary of State the adoption of a treaty which surrenders the claims of the New England fishermen which that Senator once so courageously espoused, and which has been negotiated against his declaration that no negotiation ought to be instituted; but it would seem as if he might have taken on the galling yoke and have misapplied his great powers of statement and argument against claims which he has so earnestly urged without placing his signature and securing those of his Democratic associates to a State paper in which the only pertinent assertion on an important point of an elaborate argument is a gross and inexcusable error.

It may be asked, of what real importance is this question; how can any real harm have been done by the appointment and action of Messrs. Angell and Putnam, when it is probable that the same treaty would have been negotiated by the Secretary of State and the President? The answer is, that the Senate had the right to have the treaty negotiated and presented for its consideration constitutionally, and especially to have the country protected, in case of its rejection, from the evil consequences of admissions made by persons claiming wrongfully to be its agents and plenipotentiaries. Of these consequences let Sir Charles Tupper speak:

> What, I repeat, is our position to-day? If that treaty were rejected by the Senate to-morrow, we have gained this vantage ground, that we stand in the position of having it declared by the Secretary of State of the United States and by the President of the United States that Canada has been ready to make and that Her Majesty's Government on behalf of Canada, through her plenipotentiaries, have made an arrangement with the plenipotentiaries of the United States that is fair, just, and equitable, and that leaves that country no possible cause of complaint.

The consequences, whatever they may be in future controversies, of the admissions made by the President and Secretary of State are inevitable; but against the admissions of the other miscalled plenipotentiaries, who were in fact only impertinent private citizens, the country had the right to be protected. The assumed character and office of those persons ought to be emphatically repudiated by the Senate.

5. The treaty is a national dishonor, because the American negotiators secure only the bare rights of hospitality for our fishing vessels in British ports and do not obtain for such vessels free entry and full commercial rights in those ports, such as are now and have been freely granted to the fishing vessels and other vessels of Canada and Great Britain in American ports.

This is the main contention. The United States can not with dignity and honor as a nation adopt a treaty under which any American vessels are to have fewer rights in British ports than similar British vessels are to have in ports of the United States, while with mutual and equal commercial rights conceded to vessels of both nations all the other contentions might be fairly adjusted.

As long, however, as the British attitude is this: "You now give us full commercial rights for our ships in your ports; in return we will give you the ordinary rights of hospitality for your ships in our ports: and we will give you some additional commercial rights when you will repeal your duties on fish"—so long the United States should refuse to come to an agreement. We could not assent to such a bargain without acknowledging our inferiority as a nation to Great Britain—yes, even to Canada; we should dishonor, disgrace, and degrade ourselves by treating on such terms of inequality.

It is of no avail to point to the treaty of 1818 and attempt to justify a narrow construction of that instrument. Eighteen hundred and eighteen is not 1888. Our fishermen are entitled to all the benefits which the treaty of 1818 secures, plus all those rights and privileges which modern rules o icommercial intercourse will add to them. The favored fishing vessel of 1818 (a time when no other American vessel could enter a Canadian port at all) is not to become the proscribed fishing vessel of 1888, when all other vessels of the United States have and exercise the free and full right to enter and buy and sell in all Canadian ports.

In 1818 our fishing vessels were entitled to enter Canadian ports for repairs, shelter, food, and water, but no other American vessels could enter Canadian ports for any purpose. Under the commercial convention which had been made July 3, 1815, American ships had been admitted to all British ports in Europe, but not to those in America. The article was as follows:

> ARTICLE I. There shall be between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and generally the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

But in progress of time there came the arrangements of 1830, under which free liberty of commerce in ships grew up between the United States and Canadian ports; and there came also the treaties concerning these fisheries, the reciprocity treaty of 1854 and in 1871 the treaty of Washington; and as a result of all this enlargement of the rules of intercourse the fishing vessels of the United States came to have and enjoy the rights of ordinary commercial vessels in Canadian ports, while certain it is that Canadian fishing vessels came to have and enjoy full commercial rights in United States ports. The contentions during all these years, whether years of strict or liberal relations, were rarely about entries into ports or rights and privileges while there, but were mainly about fishing or preparing to fish in forbidden waters.

And now that the treaty of 1871 is abrogated, after we have been unfairly compelled to pay $5,500,000 for benefits falsely assumed to have been derived from it, and have refused to pay the price any longer, are we to be driven back strictly upon the treaty of 1818 or are our fishing vessels to be entitled to full commercial privileges without being compelled to buy them by alterations in our customs laws? I believe that we are fairly entitled to them, and that at all events we can not safely or honorably pay for them the price demanded by Canada and Great Britain. The time has come for rising from any real or assumed position of inferiority to Great Britain and establishing relations between Canada and the United States on equal terms and on no others.

Mark how boldly Englishmen assume that America is to negotiate in a position of inferiority to England. Sir Charles Tupper says in his speech of April 10:

> Why is it that the fishermen of the United States of America can not obtain the same consideration in a Canadian port that a Canadian fisherman obtains in the United States ports? Well, sir, the answer is obvious. The American Government renounced the right to enter our waters, as England and Canada never did renounce the right to enter the waters of the United States of America.

This has been the language of the English diplomatists throughout, and yet nothing is more absurd than the oft-repeated assertion, made also by the American apologists of this treaty, that because the United States, in the treaty of 1818, renounced "forever" certain liberties theretofore enjoyed on the British North American coasts and agreed that our fishing vessels should enter Canadian bays and harbors for certain specific purposes, but "for no other purpose whatever," therefore there can now be no just claim for enlarged rights.

As well might the grantee in a deed plead the word "forever" against his grantor after a repurchase of the real estate by the latter. The renunciation "forever" and the limitation of the purposes for entering are of no avail against any enlargement of privileges which may have already grown up since 1818 or which it may now concern the interests, the dignity, and the honor of the United States to demand upon just grounds and upon fair equivalents.

That there has been such an enlargement of the privileges of American fishing vessels in Canadian ports since 1818, and independently of the treaties of 1854 and 1871, has been stoutly maintained by the present Secretary of State up to the time when it suited his purposes to make this treaty.

In Mr. Bayard's proposals of November 12, 1886, for an ad interim arrangement, was included the following:

> ART. 4. The fishing vessels of the United States shall have in the established ports of entry of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions in America the same commercial privileges as other vessels of the United States, including the purchase of bait and other supplies.

To this reasonable proposal the Marquis of Salisbury was able only to reply as follows:

> This article is also open to grave objection. It proposes to give the United States fishing vessels the same commercial privileges as those to which other vessels of the United States are entitled, although such privileges are expressly renounced by the convention of 1818 on behalf of fishing vessels, which were thereafter to be denied the right of access to Canadian waters for any purpose whatever except those of shelter, repairs, and purchase of wood and water.

Here again is the reiteration, as the Senator from Delaware well says, usque ad nauseam, "1818, 1818." But Mr. Bayard, July 12, 1887, well and unanswerably replied:

> The treaty of 1818 related solely to fisheries. It was not a commercial convention, and no commercial privileges were renounced by it. It contains no reference to "ports," of which it is believed the only ones then existing were Hallfax, in Nova Scotia, and possibly one or two more in the other provinces; and these ports were not until long afterwards opened, by reciprocal commercial relations, to vessels of the United States engaged in trading.

The right to "obtain" (i. e., take or fish for) bait, was not insisted upon by the American negotiators and was doubtless omitted from the treaty because, as it would have permitted fishing for that purpose, it was a partial reassertion of the right to fish within the limits as to which the right to take fish had already been expressly renounced.

The purchase of bait and other supplies by the American fishermen in the established ports of entry of Canada, as proposed in Article IV, is not regarded as inconsistent with any of the provisions of the treaty of 1818; and in this relation it is pertinent to note the declaration of the Earl of Kimberly in his letter of February 16, 1871, to Lord Lisgar, that "the exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818 and by the terms of the imperial act 59, George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure inconsistent with the general policy of the empire, and they were disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

It is not contended that the right to purchase bait and supplies, or any other privilege of trade, was given by the treaty of 1818. Neither was any such right or privilege stipulated for or given by the treaty of 1854, nor by the treaty of Washington; and the Halifax commission decided in 1877 that it was not competent for that tribunal to award compensation for commercial intercourse between the two countries, nor for purchasing bait, ice, supplies, etc., nor for permission to transship cargoes in British waters. And yet this Government is not aware that, during the existence of the treaty of 1854 or the treaty of Washington, question was ever made of the right of American fishermen to purchase bait and other supplies in Canadian ports, or that such privileges were ever denied them.

Moreover, in Mr. Bayard's letter to Minister West of May 10, 1886, he recites the—gradual extension from time to time of the provisions of Article I of the convention of July 3, 1815, providing for reciprocal liberty of commerce between the United States and the territories of Great Britain in Europe so as gradually to include the colonial possessions of Great Britain in North America and the West Indies within the results of that treaty.

And then Mr. Bayard proceeds to make the following statement:

President Jackson's proclamation of October 5, 1830, created a reciprocal commercial intercourse, on terms of perfect equality of flag, between this country and the British American dependencies by repealing the navigation acts of April 18, 1818, May 15, 1820, and March 1, 1823, and admitting British vessels and their cargoes "to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain on or near the American continent and north or east of the United States."

And thereupon Mr. Bayard further says to Mr. West:

I ask you to consider the results of excluding American vessels, duly possessed of permits from their own Government to touch and trade at Canadian ports as well as to engage in deep-sea fishing, from exercising freely the customary and reasonable rights and privileges of trade in the ports of the British colonies as are freely allowed to British vessels in all the ports of the United States under the laws and regulations to which I have adverted.

Among these customary rights and privileges may be enumerated the purchase of ship supplies of every nature, making repairs, the shipment of crews in whole or part, and the purchase of ice and bait for use in deep-sea fishing.

Concurrently, these usual, rational, and convenient privileges are freely extended to and are fully enjoyed by the Canadian merchant marine of all occupations, including fishermen in the ports of the United States. The question therefore arises whether such a construction is admissible as would convert the treaty of 1818 from being an instrumentality for the protection of the inshore fisheries along the described ports of the British American coast into a pretext or means of obstructing the business of deep-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and of interrupting and destroying the commercial intercourse that since the treaty of 1818, and independent of any treaty whatever, has grown up and now exists under the concurrent and friendly laws and mercantile regulations of the respective countries.

I may recall to your attention the fact that a proposition to exclude the vessels of the United States engaged in fishing from carrying also merchandise was made by the British negotiators of the treaty of 1818, but being resisted by the American negotiators was abandoned. This fact would seem clearly to indicate that the business of fishing did not then and does not now disqualify a vessel from also trading in the regular ports of entry.

In his speech of April 10 Sir Charles Tupper states this contention of Mr. Bayard and makes the best reply he can to it, as follows:

It was claimed by the Government of the United States in 1818 that as no commercial vessel could come into the waters of British North America from the United States, there was no intercourse; that those were privileges given to the fishing vessels by that treaty beyond anything that was enjoyed by any other class of vessels. And when a changed condition of things came about, when the commercial arrangement of 1830 had, as they contended, entirely changed the status of their fishing vessels in our waters—since, as they said, under that commercial arrangement it was provided that their trading vessels could enter freely the ports of British North America, and our trading vessels could enter their ports, as there was no exemption or exclusion of fishing vessels, they claimed that rights had been acquired by the fishing vessels that entirely took them out of the category of the treaty of 1818, under which they were restricted from going into our waters for any but the four purposes.

Sir Charles then proceeds to assert that the contention is unfounded, because the arrangement of 1830 was a commercial arrangement, and that the king's order in council was "silent as to fishing vessels." He then says:

The treaty solemnly declared that the people of the United States renounced forever the right to claim for a fishing vessel any such commercial privileges whatever. And under those circumstances it is a principle in law, constitutional as well as general law, and, I believe, accepted by all countries, that you can not repeal and change and alter a specific provision by a general one, unless some arrangement had been subsequently provided as to such specific provision. The general terms as to vessels in the commercial arrangement of 1830 and the absence of any reference to fishing vessels left fishing vessels exactly in the same position as they were before.

This argument of Sir Charles Tupper that a broad international arrangement giving absolute commercial freedom to all vessels does not include fishing vessels is quite as weak as the proposition that the word "forever" in an agreement can be pleaded against a different contract subsequently made.

The only answers made to Mr. Bayard's claim for commercial rights for fishing vessels by Mr. George E. Foster, the very able and intensely unfriendly Canadian minister of marine and fisheries, in his long report inclosed in Mr. Harding's note of August 2, 1886, and in his shorter report of June 5, 1886, are a bare denial that the later commercial arrangements either extended or restricted the terms of the convention of 1818, and a reference to the fact that no such allegation was set up when that convention was made the basis of further privileges in the treaty of Washington.

It is a sufficient reply to Mr. Foster to say that the further privileges secured by the treaty of Washington were an exact repetition of those of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and in neither of those treaties were commercial rights for fishing vessels in the ports of Canada expressly stipulated for, because they had in fact never been refused after 1830, and are now only refused as a means of worrying the United States into another reciprocity treaty.

The claim for commercial privileges for all our American vessels in Canadian ports thus clearly and cogently stated by Secretary Bayard was ably re-enforced by all the other representations made to England which proceeded from the State Department and Minister Phelps, and was fully sustained by declarations from committees, Senators, and Representatives in Congress without dissent and without distinction of party. There is little reason to doubt that if it had been firmly adhered to it would have been allowed by the British Government, which would have overruled the unreasonable violence of Canada.

The first yielding of our Government was seen in the appointment of a commission to negotiate. Even after this mistake success might have been attained. It was a necessity to the political fortunes of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain that he should negotiate some treaty. He had abandoned the liberal party in Great Britain, betrayed the cause of Ireland, and made an unnatural alliance with his former political enemies, who sent him to this country to get him temporarily out of the way. If he had been obliged to return without negotiating a treaty he would have been the laughing-stock of England, and he knew it. His anxieties and his fears were apparent to all close observers; that he would concede substantially all that our Government had claimed there was no reasonable doubt.

But it happened that Mr. Bayard was even more anxious than Mr. Chamberlain. Perhaps the vanity of the aged statesman, the desire to be known as the negotiator of the Bayard-Chamberlain treaty, overcame any wish he had to protect the rights of the New England fishermen and to maintain the national honor: and so Mr. Chamberlain at last, suddenly and unexpectedly, obtained an easy victory.

But there must have been more in the surrender than the vanity and decrepitude of Mr. Bayard. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that a combination was formed between the leaders of the Democratic party to sacrifice the interests of the New England fishermen and to break down our tariff system. The utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, which I have quoted conclusively prove this. To carry out this plan diplomatic correspondence was dropped; an unconstitutional commission was created; the demand for commercial rights was abandoned; a surrender was made to all the Canadian theories concerning the fisheries, and the initial step in the main purpose of the alliance was taken in Article XV of the treaty, which is intended to force Congress to remove some of our customs duties. Southern Democrats gave the orders to Northern Democrats; the Democratic party abandoned its spasmodic attempt to defend the fishermen against Canadian aggression; and the great object of this Democratic-British alliance now is to pass the Mills bill, keep the Democratic party in power, and destroy the American tariff system.

These unpatriotic and injurious assaults upon American interests of the combined forces of English free-traders and Southern Democrats should be met at the threshold by the rejection of this discreditable treaty. The admissions made by its negotiators will doubtless make it more difficult to obtain from England our just rights. But asserted with moderation, patience and firmness they will surely be granted. England will not in 1888 refuse to grant us the article of the treaty of 1815 with the two words "in Europe" omitted, which is all we need desire, as follows:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of Her Britannic Majesty a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also, to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and generally the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

The bugbear of war need not frighten any one. England never went to war with any nation to force the opening of ports for trade, except with China to compel the admission of opium. Even the excessive retaliation which it has been intimated the President will attempt if this pet treaty shall be rejected would be no cause for war. A decision to give to Canadian fishing vessels in American ports only the same privileges which are given American vessels in Canadian ports, and to exclude Canadian fish from our markets, will at any time give the New England fishermen all they desire. Retaliation to this extent the President, who is not always under the control of Southern Democrats, will doubtless first adopt; there will probably never be occasion to resort to more.

The question of the rights and privileges of American fishermen in the waters, on the coasts, and in the harbors of Canada, in recently dealing with which the United States has occupied the position of an inferior nation, dealing with one vastly superior, if taken up for consideration by our Government in a spirit not sectional, but national, and treated in appropriate negotiations with England, as it should be dealt with in this era of international intercourse by two great nations, equal in dignity, honor, and power, may yet be, even by this Administration, satisfactorily and honorably settled; if it is not it certainly will be so adjusted by the administration which will come into power on the 4th of March, 1889.

In this connection it is interesting to notice the contrast between two distinguished New England Democrats. One of them, Mr. William L. Putnam, a lawyer of ability and amiability, employed by the United States to defend fishermen's rights, enters into a combination to sacrifice them; his head is enlarged by the novelty of his fictitious title of plenipotentiary; he is carried off his feet by association with British aristocrats; he officiates as an illegally appointed member of an unconstitutional commission; signs, when ordered, an ignominious treaty; and now pretentiously offers himself as a Democratic candidate for governor of Maine on the platform of the surrender of our fishery interests and the exemption of imported Canadian merchandise from our tariff duties.

The other, Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury, is a Democrat of the purest water. By age, inheritance, association, general professional learning, profound study of the question, Mr. Woodbury is entitled to speak with authority. He is one of the best admiralty and revenue lawyers we have. He was district attorney under President Buchanan; his father was Secretary of the Treasury under General Jackson. He knows this fishery question as he knows his alphabet. He was taught by his father; he has been familiar with it for forty years; his Democracy can never be questioned, nor can his patriotism. New Hampshire Democrats and Republicans alike regard him with respect and honor as one of the ablest and truest of the sons of the Granite State. I desire to read a letter written by Mr. Woodbury May 4 to the New York Sun:

To the Editor of the Sun:

SIR: The Chamberlain treaty is now before the Senate. It surrenders everything the United States have contended for since 1838, when the dispute on the 3-mile limit began, contentions which the British authorities have assented to or temporized about as often as pressed, so that really in no entire year since then have they insisted on enforcing their headland theory.

The commercial rights of the United States under the agreements of 1830 are utterly abandoned by Mr. Bayard after much previous insistance on their obligation.

The rights of common humanity toward our vessels in distress, accorded everywhere except on the Canadian coast, are hereafter to be allowed only upon the condition that the United States shall change its present registry laws by repealing them, and enacting such new ones as are acceptable to the British Government before going into effect. This of course leaves the humanity of Canada to vessels of the United States in distress withheld until the United States shall pay the consideration by repealing its laws and making such new ones.

Commercial intercourse by our fishing vessels is disallowed, but they may be permitted to buy a narrow line of supplies, whose extent would not exceed $50,000 a year, when the United States shall have repealed existing duties, now over $611,000 a year, on Canadian fish and oil, and made them free in our markets.

This is the substance of the treaty, all losses to the United States both in honor and profit. General Jackson and Mr. McLane, Van Buren and Forsyth, Stevenson and Everett, Webster, Rush, Grant, Evarts, and even Bayard and Phelps, for two of their official years, are buried beneath this treaty and their memories dishonored by its retreat from their patriotic contentions for American rights.

Cavilers have said the treaty of 1818 was wrung from our weakness, but this treaty, made in the hour of our strength, surrenders what that never did—our markets; and it doubles the waters from which it requires we shall be forever excluded.

The consequence of adopting this treaty would be the destruction of the fishery under the American flag, the paralysis of our hope of naval power, and a British monopoly of our markets, aggrandizing its dangerous naval power. Let the treaty be rejected.

CHARLES LEVI WOODBURY.

BOSTON, May 4, 1888.

Mr. Woodbury's is the courage for America of an Andrew Jackson Democrat. Mr. Putnam's is the subserviency towards England of a Grover Cleveland Democrat.

Mr. President, it is not alone in dealing with the New England fishery interests that the State Department has abandoned traditional American policy and humiliated the United States in the eyes of foreign nations. It has also formally surrendered the Monroe doctrine, and the surrender has been submitted to by Southern Democrats without one dissenting voice. Nothing so plainly shows the change that has come over the spirit of the Democracy of the South occasioned by their unsuccessful attempt at rebellion as their indifference to the encroachments of European nations on the North American continent. Once an assault upon the Monroe doctrine by a President, Whig or Democrat, would have brought every Democratic Senator to his feet with bold and patriotic denunciations. Now, not one of them so much as notices the ignominious betrayal of the interests of the United States in connection with the American Isthmus by their President and their Secretary of State.

Upon no one subject have American statesmen been more emphatic or so unanimous as they have in declaring that European powers shall obtain no new foothold in the western hemisphere.

John Quincy Adams when Secretary of State wrote to the Russian minister at Washington:

We should assume distinctly the principle that the American continents are no longer subjects for any new European colonial establishment.

Jefferson, on the 24th of October, 1823, wrote to President Monroe that the—object is to introduce and establish the American system of keeping out of our land all foreign powers; of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nation.

Madison, in a note to Jefferson early in November, 1823, said:

In the great struggle of the epoch between liberty and despotism we owe it to ourselves to sustain the former, in this hemisphere at least.

In July, 1823, Mr. Adams, in a letter to Mr. Middleton, further declared that the claim then pressed by Russia to possessions on the northwestern coast of North America was not conducive to the peace of the world.

He said:

With the exception of the British establishments north of the United States, the remainder of both the American continents must henceforth be left to the management of American hands.

President Monroe, in his annual message to Congress dated December 2, 1823, giving an account of the claims of Russia on the northwest and of Spain on her late colonies, declared that—

The occasion had been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

President Adams, in his message of March, 1826, speaking of advantages to be derived from independent American states, says that among the subjects of consultation proposed at Panama was—the means of making effectual the assertion of that principle to permit no colonial lodgment or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil.

The same policy was urged by Mr. Clay, as Secretary of State, in correspondence with Mexico, and it was adopted by the four states represented at Panama.

President Polk, in his message of December, 1845, after approving the Monroe declaration, says:

No future European colony or domain shall, with our consent, be planted or established on any part of the American continent.

President Grant was firmly in favor of the Monroe doctrine and of applying it to the case of any canal across the Isthmus. His position best appears from his message of July 14, 1870, transmitting to the Senate the report of Secretary Fish, which says:

The United States stand solemnly committed by repeated declarations and repeated acts to this doctrine and its application to the affairs of this continent. This policy is not a policy of aggression, but it opposes the creation of European dominion on American soil, or its transfer to other European powers, and it looks hopefully to the time when by the voluntary departure of European Governments from this continent and the adjacent islands America shall be wholly American.

A special message, sent by President Hayes to Congress on March 8, 1880, says:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to the surrender of this control to any European power or to any combination of European powers. * * * The capital invested by corporations or citizens of other countries in such an enterprise must in a great degree look for protection to one or more of the great powers of the world. No European power can intervene for such protection without adopting measures on this continent which the United States would deem wholly inadmissible.

If the protection of the United States is relied upon, the United States must exercise such control as will enable this country to protect its national interests and maintain the rights of those whose private capital is embarked in the work. * * * I repeat, in conclusion, that it is the right and the duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interests. * * *

In June, 1881, Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State for President Garfield, sent a circular note to the United States ministers in Europe stating what he understood to be the American view. The United States Government had already guarantied "positively and efficaciously" the neutrality of the Isthmus canal, and that guaranty—

Does not require re-enforcement or accession or assent from any other power. * * * Supplementing the guaranty * * * would necessarily be regarded by this Government as an uncalled-for intrusion into a field where the local and general interests of the United States of America must be considered before those of any other power save those of the United States of Columbia.

Any attempt—

Continues Mr. Blaine—

to supersede that guaranty by an agreement between European powers which maintain vast armies and patrol the seas with immense fleets, and whose interest in the canal and its operations can never be so vital and supreme as ours, would partake of the nature of an alliance against the United States. * * * It is the long-settled conviction of this Government that any extension to our shores of the political system by which the great powers have controlled and determined events in Europe, would be attended with danger to the peace and welfare of this nation.

And Mr. Blaine goes on:

A mere agreement on paper between the great powers of Europe might prove ineffectual to preserve the canal in time of hostilities. The first sound of a cannon in a general European war would, in all probability, annul the treaty of neutrality, and the strategic canal would be held by the first power that would seize it—

To the incalculable loss of the United States. For these reasons the Isthmus should be placed—under the control of that government least likely to be engaged in war, and able, in any and every event, to enforce the guardianship which she shall assume. For self-protection to their own interests, therefore, the United States, in the first instance, assert their right to control the Isthmus transit; and, secondly, they offer, by such control, that absolute neutralization of the canal as respects European powers which can in no other way be certainly attained and lastingly assured.

The administration of President Arthur came to realize, however, that in the progress of human enterprise in this wonderful era of the world's development the United States could not, as the application of the Monroe doctrine to the question of a canal across the Isthmus, merely oppose the construction of such a canal, or assert their intention to control the canal by whomever built, without making any effort to promote the construction of such a work. The President, therefore, as an affirmative policy, negotiated December 1, 1884, a treaty with the Government of Nicaragua, by which the United States obtained from that Republic the right to build a canal, railway, and telegraph line across the Isthmus by way of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, upon such conditions as would give the absolute and exclusive control of the transit to the two Republics, would exclude European interference, and would completely vindicate the Monroe doctrine.

The treaty was submitted to the Senate during the session of 1884–'85, but being opposed by the Democrats, especially by Senator Bayard, then about to become Secretary of State, it failed to receive a two-thirds vote; but a motion to reconsider its rejection was entered.

On the 12th day of March, 1885, however, without giving an opportunity for final action by the Senate, President Cleveland withdrew the treaty, refused to resubmit it, and it has never since been heard of. In his message of December 8, 1885, he gives his reasons for his action. They are somewhat obscure, but may be stated in his own language, as follows:

That the treaty involves—

A policy of acquisition of new and distant territory and the incorporation of remote interests with our own—

The assertion of—

Paramount privileges of ownership or right outside of our own territory, coupled with absolute and unlimited engagements to defend the territorial integrity of the State where such interests lie—

And the combination of—

The construction, ownership, and operation of such a work by this Government with an offensive and defensive alliance for its protection with the foreign state whose responsibilities and rights we would share.

It seems clear that these propositions of President Cleveland are inconsistent with adherence to the Monroe doctrine as applicable to the canal. If European nations are to be excluded from any control of the canal and from any guaranty for its neutralization, such control must be exercised and such neutralization must be guarantied by the local State through which it runs, or by the United States in connection with such local State.

It will not for a moment be pretended that the control and guaranty of such local State alone will be sufficient either to insure the neutralization of the canal or to protect the paramount interests of the American people.

The United States, then, must exercise a certain control of the canal, and must in connection with the local State guaranty its neutralization. But this will be impossible without either acquiring territory and incorporating the interests of the other nation with our own, or making engagements to defend the territorial integrity of that other nation, or forming an alliance with the foreign State for the protection of the canal.

It is absolutely impossible to conceive of the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine in connection with the Isthmus canal and of an enforcement of the paramount interests of the United States therein which will not violate the conditions laid down by President Cleveland. Although the message contains the vague declaration that—

We should be jealously alert in preventing the American hemisphere from being involved in the political problems and complications of distant governments—and an assertion of—the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit, yet as the President, while rejecting and condemning the method proposed by the previous administration, utterly fails to state any affirmative method of his own by which American interests can be protected, the conclusion is irresistible that the Monroe doctrine as applicable to the canal has been by the acts and declarations of this Administration formally and deliberately abandoned.

Thus does the Administration of Cleveland and Bayard discredit the United States in its foreign relations.

The dishonoring acts and omissions do not concern one section of the country alone.

South of us a French company, instigated and supported by the French Government, is slowly but surely pushing its canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and within five years the Isthmus of Panama is likely to become a French colony, while this Administration is opposing and defeating the Nicaragua Canal scheme, proposing no canal in its place, giving up all efforts to prevent or neutralize French aggression, and abandoning all assertions against either France or England of that traditional policy known as the Monroe doctrine, which has been cherished by all American statesmen, almost from the foundation of the Government down to the inauguration of this un-American Administration.

North of us the Dominion of Canada, aided by the British Empire, is growing stronger and more powerful than she ever dreamed she could become. Her transcontinental railroad and her naval stations are making her as formidable on the Pacific as on the Atlantic. She is boldly seizing our transportation business and forcing her way into our markets. She perpetrates outrages upon our fishing vessels, and thus compels us to treat with her upon unequal and degrading terms, and Great Britain backs all her demands, while President Cleveland submits to all these British aggressions, and in his last annual message, through an amazing solecism then perpetrated by a President for the first time in our history, he omits to treat of any question of foreign or domestic policy except one. He recommends to Congress to join with him in his alliance with Great Britain to strike down the American tariff system and to push on the plan of the Democratic party announced by its national conventions of 1856 and 1860 as "progressive free trade throughout the world," which, it may be added as a further part of the policy of the Administration, is to be carried on in British-built ships, while the flag of the American merchant marine disappears from the foreign carrying trade.

How long are the protection of American interests, North, South, East, West, at home and abroad, on sea and on land, and the defense of the national honor of the United States to be intrusted to hands like these?

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. TELLER. It has been my purpose to continue this discussion to-morrow immediately after the disposition of the morning business. I have been quite unwell for a day or two, but if I am sufficiently well to do so I propose to address the Senate to-morrow at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

Mr. BLAIR. I was unable to hear the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. I will first move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 405) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator give way to me for a moment, not to move to take up a bill, but to make an announcement?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I did not know that the bill just announced was to come before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the unfinished business, coming over from a previous day.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to interfere with that bill, but after that is through with to-morrow morning I shall move to take up the Senate bill for the retirement of General John C. Frémont as a major-general. It is a matter that has gone over from week to week, largely at the request of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who has been absent, but who is now present. It is desirable that the bill should be considered and a conclusion reached upon it to-morrow, because the House Committee on Military Affairs has Wednesday evening for the consideration of its bills in the other branch, and a bill of this kind has been reported from that committee.

To-morrow morning, at the termination of the routine morning business, I shall endeavor to secure the assent of the Senate to proceed with the bill, which will take but little time, and will not interfere with other measures that would take more time of the Senate.

WRECK OF STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 869) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CAMERON, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

TOBIAS BANEY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 121, entitled "An act granting a pension to Tobias Baney."

This soldier was enrolled on the 28th day of February, 1865, and was discharged on the 31st day of January, 1866.

He filed an application for a pension in 1878, which was supplemented by statements from time to time, not always in exact agreement, but alleging uniformly that during his service, fixing the date at one time as in January, 1866, and at another time as in November, 1865, he was attacked in the city of Washington by palpitation of the heart, which increased after his discharge and resulted in disability. After a careful special examination by the Pension Bureau the claim was rejected upon the ground that origin of disability in the service and line of duty had not been shown, nor that the same existed for some time after discharge.

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted shortly before the surrender of the Confederate forces, and it appears did little if anything more than garrison duty. He does not seem to have suffered any of the exposures usually incident to a soldier's service, and, as I understand his claim, does not himself give any instance of exposure or exertion from which his difficulty arose.

There is no record of any sickness or disability during the time he was in the Army nor any satisfactory proof that he was suffering with any ailment at the time of his discharge. His own statement, which some of the proof taken tends to show is not entirely reliable, goes no further than to claim that during his term of service his difficulty began.

On appeal from the rejection of the beneficiary's claim, the case was thoroughly examined at the Interior Department, and the rejection affirmed.

I am entirely satisfied that the case was properly determined.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 16, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the bill, with the veto message, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMANDA F. DECK—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 470, entitled "An act granting a pension to Amanda F. Deck."

The husband of this beneficiary was pensioned for a gunshot wound in his right shoulder, which he received in 1864 in a battle with Indians.

The report of the committee to which the bill was referred states nothing concerning the death of the soldier, and gives no information as to the date or cause of the same; and the recommendation that a pension should be given the widow is based upon the service and injury of the soldier and the circumstances of the beneficiary.

No claim was filed in the Pension Bureau on behalf of the widow. This, perhaps, is accounted for by the fact that information is lodged in that bureau to the effect that the deceased soldier died on the 21st day of September, 1883, "from a pistol ball fired by Luther Cultor."

If he was killed in a personal encounter, as the report of his death would seem to indicate, I am unable to see how his death can be in any way attributed to his military service, or his widow be justly pensioned therefor.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 16, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the bill, with the veto message, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 308) for the relief of Faran & McLean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report embodying the views of the majority and minority of the committee on the bill (S. 2556) for the relief of Charles B. Newton, heretofore reported.

AMENDMENT TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS UNDER THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 405) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. 3. Any officer or agent of the United States who shall hereafter authorize any laborer under his charge or control to perform for the United States more than eight hours of manual labor in any one day shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to offer a modification of the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; but I suggest that I am on the floor and that I wish to say something about the bill. I have not taken the floor yet in regard to it, but the floor has been appropriated by others.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to modify the amendment by substituting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modification of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any officer or agent of the United States to make any contract or arrangement whereby any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic shall perform more than eight hours' labor in any one day, or shall receive for his services performed in any one day more than the wages for one day's labor, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall there be any deduction from the amount of the wages of any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic by reason of the limitation to eight hours' work. Whenever the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics in the employ of the United States are unable to perform the labor required, working eight hours per day, other persons shall be employed to perform such extra or additional work: Provided, That in case of emergency where the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on any particular work or undertaking are unable to perform the necessary labor in eight hours to meet the necessities of the case, and other persons can not be procured to perform such extra labor and to meet such emergency, a special contract may be made with the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on such work to perform additional hours of labor and to receive a corresponding additional compensation. Any officer or agent of the United States who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be fined in any sum not exceeding $500.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this bill has been pending before Congress for some six or eight years at least, and in provision substantially the same for a still longer period. It grows out of the fact that in the year 1868 Congress enacted a law in these words:

Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

That is section 3738 of the Revised Statutes.

After the enactment of this law by Congress great difficulty was found in its practical enforcement, so that those classes of our fellow-citizens in the employ of the Government were required to labor, in a great many instances, in nearly all the Departments, for a longer period than that which was prescribed by law.

The discussions which preceded the passing of the law, in which some of the Senators now present participated, as well as amendments offered to modify its form, demonstrated that the sense in which the law was understood by Congress at the time of its passage was that for eight hours' labor performed by parties in the employ of the Government in these capacities they were to receive the same compensation as was paid to parties outside the employ of the Government in the same vicinity; that is to say, the same compensation that parties in private employ received for a full day's work, whether it was eight, ten, twelve, or fifteen hours, regardless of its length; and that no diminution was to be made to the laborer, workman, or mechanic in the employ of the United States by reason of the fact that he labored for a shorter period of time than the hours constituting a day's labor in private employ.

As I said before, there was great difficulty found in the practical enforcement of the act. I should say that immediately after the passage of the act a proclamation was issued by the then President, Johnson, on the request of the Senate by a resolution unanimously passed, so that employers in behalf of the Government of the United States in all parts of the country understood the provisions of the law. Therefore any violation of it was and must be held to have been intentional on the part of the subagents of the United States, although the highest authority of the United States had taken pains to make proclamation to the whole country of the existence of the law; and the debate showed, if there was nothing else that could show it, and the language itself showed distinctly its meaning.

Time passed on, and the year following, in the month of May, 1869, President Grant, then being in the executive chair and his attention being called to the violation of the law, issued his proclamation requiring its observance, and it was better observed. In some of the Departments it was faithfully observed throughout the entire administration of General Grant.

But even his efforts were not completely successful during his entire administration in securing the observance of the law; and in the year 1872 there was an act of Congress passed growing out of its violation. By that act the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to pay whatever arrearages existed between the passage of the law and the date of President Grant's proclamation, which it has been estimated amounted to some $300,000 or $400,000; but since the passage of that law only a small amount of the actual dues has as yet been paid; it is stated at some $22,000 to $25,000 of the $300,000 or over which was supposed to be actually due in the way of these excesses, during the period that I have mentioned, which was a trifle less than a year. There have been other payments, so that I understand from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], which he alluded to here the other day, but which I have not seen as yet, that some $600,000 or $700,000 have been paid from time to time on account of the excess of labor during General Grant's administration and the latter portion of that of President Johnson.

There have been from time to time Executive proclamations, efforts made by the Cabinet officers to secure the observance of this law, but during the entire period of President Hayes's administration and a large part of the administration of General Garfield and of President Arthur, the law was violated. From 1877 to 1883, inclusive, for nearly eight years' time, the law was violated one-half of each year. This was almost entirely true of the Navy Department. It was to some extent true of the War Department. I do not understand that it was to any great extent true of the Interior or the Post-Office Departments, but there may be some arrearages in both Departments. As I said, during this period of eight years, for one half the year, that is, in the warm season, the employés of the United States in the Departments of War and Navy were compelled to labor ten hours for six months in each year instead of eight hours which the law required, and for those ten hours, labor they received precisely the same compensation as for eight hours' work.

This bill, making provision for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, and for the payment of these arrearages, has been acted upon by committees in both Houses of Congress for three Congresses in succession. Every time, upon full investigation, there has been a favorable and in many instances a unanimous report in favor of the bill. Yet it has never come up for discussion until the present time in either House of Congress, or at all events, if discussed, there has never been formal action taken by either House.

I shall not consume the time of the Senate in showing the construction which has been placed upon the law from time to time by executive officers and by the proclamations of Presidents. I will, however, take occasion to say that Secretary Chandler enforced the law, that Secretary Whitney has enforced the law, and that the present President, President Cleveland, in a declaration which is incorporated in one of the reports, states that he considers the true intent and meaning of the law to be that for eight hours the Government employés shall receive the same compensation as any private employé in the same vicinity is paid for a day's work of any length whatever; that he is unaware of any violation of his construction of the law under the present Administration, and if there be such violations and they are brought to his knowledge they shall cease, and that the law shall be enforced.

I shall take the liberty, with the consent of the Senate, after reading a small portion of the report of your committee, which states a few of the strongest points as it occurred to the committee in favor of the bill, to incorporate the report itself as a whole in the RECORD, because this is a very important bill and there are many points concerned that, I think, should be accessible to the Senate, and to the future, it may be, as well. The committee in making their report say:

The Committee on Education and Labor to whom was referred the bill (S. 1853)—

And for which the pending bill is reported as a substitute—providing for the adjustment of the accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, having considered the same, report a bill back favorably with an amendment, to wit.

That amendment has been stricken out on motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and I am very glad of it. It was only placed there in order to meet an objection of an opponent of the bill, and when we were able to avoid it I was very glad to see it thus disposed of. I ask that the entire report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1853) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, having considered the same, report the bill back favorably with an amendment, to wit:

Amend by striking out in the second section, from and after the word "limitation," in the ninth line, down to and including the word "act," in the eleventh line, and as amended recommend its passage.

The eight-hour law was enacted on the 25th day of June, 1868, and is in the following words:

"Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States." (Section 3738, Revised Statutes.)

Great difficulty has been found in securing compliance with this statute on the part of some of the executive officers of the Government, and in the War and Navy Departments especially claims have from time to time arisen on the part of wage-workers employed by the Government for labor rendered in excess of the daily eight hours which by law constituted a full day's work.

Some of these claims have been paid, while others remain outstanding, and from time to time they are pressed for payment.

The object of this bill is to refer the whole matter to the Court of Claims for adjudication upon the basis that eight hours constitute a day's work, and that each eight hours' labor performed shall entitle the worker to receive pay for a full day's work.

It seems to a majority of your committee that the real question involved is whether the supremacy of the law shall be maintained and its manifest intent carried out by the subordinate officers charged with its execution. But it is proper to say that in many instances the excess of labor was performed with knowledge of the law, and the question has been raised whether the acceptance of the opportunity to labor for a longer period than eight hours and the reception of the ordinary pay for a day's work does not constitute a payment in full for all the labor performed, including the excess of the eight hours required by law.

The claimants allege that the excess of labor was performed under compulsion, and that they at the time protested, and have from time to time demanded of the departments concerned and of the Congress compensation for the excess of work exacted from them under threat of deprivation of any employment whatever, which, to them and their families was, in effect, deprivation of the necessaries of life, since only with work could they avoid starvation.

This subject has been before Congress a long time with favorable action by both Houses, and your committee insert, as a part of this, the report of the committee in favor of these claims made in the last Congress, which recites most of the legislation and the substantial facts pertinent to the subject.

[Senate Report No. 450, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials of workmen, laborers, and mechanics, of Philadelphia, New York, and Brooklyn, also the bill (S. 1884) relating to the eight-hour law, beg leave respectfully to report:

On the 25th day of June, 1868, Congress passed an act, commonly known as the eight-hour law, fixing the number of hours which should thereafter constitute a day's work for certain classes of Government employés.

The act is in the following words:

"Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed or who may hereafter be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States." (See 15 Statutes at Large, page 77, now Revised Statutes, section 3738.

Your committee have made careful investigation into the conduct of the officers of the Government who have had charge of the employment of the men who are entitled to the benefits intended to be conferred by the passage of this act, from its passage to the present time, and find that from the beginning the law has been, by many of the officers of the Government, disregarded, evaded, and violated. As early as the beginning of the year 1869 complaint was made to the President of the United States that the law was not enforced or regarded by the officers of the Government having charge of the employment of these men. These complaints called forth from the President, on the 19th day of May, 1869, the following proclamation:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States and repealed all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith;

"Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such workmen, laborers, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington, this 19th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1869, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-third.

"U. S. GRANT.

"By the President:

"HAMILTON FISH,

"Secretary of State."

This, however, had little or no effect, and the matter went on with little or no attention being paid to the law, the men either being required to work ten hours to earn their daily wages, or suffer a reduction of wages to correspond with the reduction of the hours of labor, until May, 1872, when the President issued a second proclamation, calling attention to the first, forbidding any reduction of wages in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor. The proclamation is in the following words:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and

"Whereas on the 19th of May, 1869, by Executive proclamation, it was directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; and

"Whereas it is now represented to me that the act of Congress and the proclamation aforesaid have not been strictly observed by all officers of the Government having charge of such workmen, laborers, and mechanics:

"Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby again call attention to the act of Congress aforesaid, and direct all officers of the Executive Departments of the Government having charge of the employment of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor." (U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. 17, page 955.)

Meantime petitions and memorials had been sent to Congress praying for relief and for the enforcement of the law, and on the 18th day of May, 1872, Congress passed an act requiring the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with and pay to their employés all sums withheld from them by reason of the reduction of the wages in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor for the time intervening between the passage of the act constituting eight hours a day's work and the 19th of May, 1869, the date of the President's first proclamation, which act is in the following language:

"SEC. 2. That the proper accounting officers be, and are hereby, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of workmen, laborers, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of the reduction of the hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Under this act many of the parties were paid, while a considerable number of the claims for the above-named period, which were filed with the accounting officers, were not paid, but still remain on file in the Department. Your committee find that notwithstanding that the Executive had, in the two instances above cited, by his proclamation declared what the spirit and intent of the law was, and the further fact that Congress had by the act above referred to given a legislative construction to the act, still many of the officers of the Government whose duty it was to execute the law adopted various measures to avoid it, and to get from the men in the employ of the Government, under their control, ten hours' work for each calendar day. One of these means was to require these men to enter into special contracts to work ten hours per day; another was to employ them by the hour, and still another was, in cases where it was practicable, to have the work done by the piece.

Another was what is known as the 15 per cent. contracts, under which nearly all the granite for the various public buildings throughout the United States was cut. Under these contracts the men were employed by the day, under the control and superintendence of the Government, and paid on Government pay-rolls, and the contractors were paid 15 per cent. on the cost of cutting the stone. The men employed on this work claimed that it was Government work, and that they were employed on behalf of the Government, and entitled to the benefit of the eight-hour law. To settle the question a suit was brought in the Court of Claims, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and was decided against the claimant on the ground that there was no privity between the claimant and the Government; that the contractor was alone responsible to the claimant for his wages. This was the case of Driscoll vs. The United States, reported in 6th Otto, page 424.

The only other case decided by the Supreme Court under this law is that of Martin vs. The United States, reported in 4 Otto, page 400. In this case the claimant was at work under a special contract to work twelve hours per day from the 1st of October to the 1st of June for $2.50 per day, and ten hours per day from the 1st of June to the 1st of October at $2.25 per day. The court held that the act of June 25, 1868, constituting a day's work, was a direction by Congress to the officers and agents of the Government, prescribing the length of time which should constitute a day where no special agreement was made on the subject, but as claimant had made a special agreement he must be bound by it. These embrace all the decisions of the Supreme Court under this law, and it will readily be seen that neither of them affects the rights of the claimants included in this bill.

None of these measures for evading the law, however, were uniformly adopted, nor was the law uniformly ignored. In some Departments the law was enforced, and notably so under the administration of President Grant, in many if not all of the navy-yards and arsenals, and also on the new State, War, and Navy building here in Washington the men were only required to work eight hours to earn their daily wages. But under the administration of President Hayes the law was practically ignored, and the men were required to work ten hours to earn the same pay that they had received under the administration of President Grant for eight hours' work.

Thus the matter has run on until the present time, some Departments ignoring the law and others enforcing it. The result, therefore, is that the Government has been requiring of a portion of its employés, laborers, workmen, and mechanics ten hours' work to earn the same amount of money that it has paid to others of the same class of labor for eight hours' work. This, your committee think, is an unfair and unjust discrimination which should not have been made. Whatever construction may be put upon the law, certainly no one will claim that it justifies such a discrimination. These men are either entitled to a full price of a day's work for eight hours' labor or they are not. If the act contemplated a reduction of the wages of labor to correspond with the reduction of the hours of labor, those who have been paid the full price of a day's work for eight hours of labor have been overpaid if such was not the intention of Congress in passing the act; if not, then the Government honestly owes these men for the difference between the value of eight and the value of ten hours' work, to be determined by the standard adopted by the Government in fixing the rate of wages paid to its employés of the class hereinbefore named.

In determining the question as to whether, under the act of June 25, 1868, these men are entitled to a full day's pay for eight hours' work, we have recourse not only to the proclamations of the President of the United States above quoted and the act of May 18, 1872, directly requiring the accounting officers of the Government to give the law this construction, but we are further enlightened by the debates in the Senate upon this act when the bill was before the Senate (page 3424, volume 68, Globe, second session Fortieth Congress). During this debate Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, offered an amendment to the effect that the wages should be reduced to correspond with the reduction of the hours of labor. This debate was participated in by Senators Morton, Wilson, Thurman, STEWART, and others. We quote from the remarks made by Senator Morton, as follows:

"Mr. MORTON. * * * As I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, I am not in favor of it. I think it will virtually defeat the object of the bill.

"Mr. CONNESS. Of course it does.

"Mr. MORTON. It proposes to adjust the rate of wages according to the length of time during which labor is performed. The effect of it would be to bring down the rate of wages, because the time for labor is shortened that much."

The amendment was rejected by a vote of 21 to 16. We also quote from the debates in the Senate on the adoption of the House resolution, No. 47, which was incorporated in section 2 of the sundry civil bill, passed May 18, 1872, and referred to above (p. 124, vol. 87, Globe, second session Forty-second Congress):

"Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to make one suggestion in reply to the Senator from Connecticut, as to what was the understanding here when the eight-hour law passed. My recollection is that the Senator from Ohio, behind me [Mr. SHERMAN], offered an amendment to that bill for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether there should be a full day's wages paid for eight hours' work or only eight hours' labor paid for. My recollection is that the question was distinctly presented in that amendment, which was voted down by a very decided majority."

Mr. Sumner, on the same resolution:

"It is unquestionably an act of justice; these workmen are out of their money, some of them are dead and are represented by their families, and to them this small allowance is of very great importance. I do not think it is advisable for us to take more time. I think we fairly owe the money, and, therefore, the sooner we pay it the better."

In the light of the legislation upon this subject, your committee have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that Congress, in passing the act of June 25, 1868, intended to lessen the hours of labor without in any degree reducing the rate of wages, and they are consequently of the opinion that in all cases where the class of employés named in the act have been required to work more than eight hours to earn their daily wages, or where the wages have been reduced on account of the reduction of the hours of labor, the Government is justly indebted to the men for the deficiency.

No appropriation is asked for in this bill; the claimants only ask to be allowed to go to a court of competent jurisdiction, where they can have an opportunity to establish their claims upon the basis that they shall be paid the full price of a day's work for eight hours' labor. And this your committee think but a reasonable request, and ought to be granted, and therefore report the bill back without amendment and recommend that it do pass.

(As to the custom of the Government in fixing the rate of wages and the order and construction of the Secretary of War, and as to the report of committee appointed to investigate the 15 per cent. contracts being made to evade the eight-hour law and extracts from Senate debates, see appenix.)

APPENDIX A.

[Court of Claims. No. 8009. Eight-hour case. James Driscoll vs. The United States. Evidence for claimant.]

Deposition of William T. Dewdney, for plaintiff, taken in Washington, D. C., on the 3d day of March, 1877.

Q. 1. State your name, age, occupation, your place of residence the past year; and whether you have any, and, if any, what, interest, direct or indirect, in the claim which is the subject of inquiry; and whether you are related, and in what degree, to the claimant.

A. W. T. Dewdney; forty-two years; carpenter; No. 1414 Seventeenth street, Washington, D. C.; I have no interest in this claim, and I am not related.

Q. 2. How are you at present employed?

A. I am assistant superintendent of the new War, State, and Navy Department building.

Q. 3. How long have you been so employed?

A. Since June, 1872.

Q. 4. State, if you know, what the Government paid stone-cutters and granite-cutters on the work here in Washington during the years 1871 and 1872.

A. In 1872 we paid granite-cutters $4.50 per day for eight hours' work.

Q. 5. Did the Government observe the eight-hour law here in Washington?

A. They did.

Q. 6. By what rule, if any, did the Government establish the scale of prices paid for labor?

A. The price paid to the mechanics and laborers employed on the Government building is established by the market price paid by parties outside.

Q. 7. Do you mean to be understood that the Government pays the same price for eight hours' labor that private parties pay for ten? If not, state what you mean to be understood by it.

(Objected to as leading.)

A. I mean that they do pay the same.

Q. 8. Do you know of any other matter relative to the claim in question? If you do, state it.

A. I do not.

WM. T. DEWDNEY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of March, 1877.

United States Commissioner, District of Columbia.

APPENDIX B.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW—SECRETARY LINCOLN'S LETTER OF INSTRUCTION THAT IT SHOULD BE ENFORCED.

Inquiry having been made at the War Department as to the truth of the repeated allegations that the eight-hour law has been disregarded by the Department, it is learned from the Acting Secretary of War, General Benét, that the charge was unfounded, as is shown by the following copy of a letter of instructions sent to him as Chief of Ordnance by Secretrry Lincoln:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 26, 1883.
